It's the little they cost to maintain that makes concrete pavements economical

The ultimate economy of concrete is the big reason for its adoption

No so-called economy is real economy unless it can justify itself in the ultimate cost. This applies with particular force to Roads.

Experience has shown how costly some roads are. There is no longer the shadow of an excuse for disregarding "ultimate economy" when planning our highways. If a road costs little to build but much to maintain, it must give way to a type of pavement which—although costing more to build— involves minimum maintenance charges.

Experience is showing that Concrete has those qualities of permanence which render it "cheapest in the long run." We cannot afford to build our roads of any less permanent material.

Faced with the imperative need of providing those hard surfaces capable of withstanding such increased strain as the increasing use of the Motor Truck inevitably represents, we must surely recognize that real economy calls for the adoption of the higher type of paving which Concrete makes possible.
