What prison doors have been pried open by the pen! There is no limiting or restraining the person to whom God has given the gift of writing. All barriers of distance and time, yes, and of censorship, too, are ultimately overcome by the written word. It is an awesome responsibility, is this one of writing, especially nowadays, when even such unworthy lines as this present articles will be thrust under the yes of Hterally millions of readers.

Just as a reader may throw down his newspaper in disapproval or tear it up, so King Jeholakim, when the writings of Jeremiah got to him, indignantly and contemptuously cut the scroll into pieces, and so burnt it up, because he disapproved of the prophet's warnings. But he did not impair by one jot the fate narrated. We cannot avert judgment by ignoring or despising the book that contains it. A ship's captain may be angered by the news conveyed in a government storm-warning, and he may toss overboard the wireless message; but that act will not affect the progress of the storm. they knew the royal temper. As for the king, he sent for the scroll and heard it; but calloused in the conceit and complacency which so often invest the privileged as an impenetrable shell, his majesty showed his contempt for the prophecy by cutting up and burning the parchment, as if that ended the matter. Even while he mocked, the feet of Babylon were turning toward his country and his capital. Three men present, one of them the father of Micaiah, were brave enough to remonstrate with the king, but he was obdurate, and would not give God the chance for clemency which, as always, Jehovah sought to exercise.

Our judgments judge us. Jeholakim's repudiation of the prophet's word proved a repudiation of the last way out of disaster. He perished ignominously; but, lo, the words that he tried to destroy by fire are being studied today over the whole world. (Copyright, 1922, by The Ellis
