WORTH-WHILE VACATIONS.

An English writer has observed that there are only two holidays that count-the holiday of adventure among new men and new places, and the holiday of the return home, and of these that the greater is the reurn home.

The vacation needed by any weary man or woman is a complete change from the manner of life being lived. Our Saviour went into the wilderness to rest awhile. We, too, need to get away from the sordidness of life and renew ourselves in body and mind. We may not have far to go to reach the ideal vacation place: sometimes it may be only a few miles from home, but it is the complete charge and contrast in our mode of life that we need in order to restore ourselves. With an assured United States market the indicated crop for 1922 would mean a complete return of prosperity for the United States farmer. The ready sale of the surplus abroad would stabilize prices at home. But the American congress refuses to have it that way. The limit of economic idiocy has been reached in the Fordney-McCumber schedules, and the August report helps to emphasize it.
