Was 'way back in eighty-three, When he came to make his home.

Didn't fear the face of clay, Whether they were white or black or half-breeds:

All he had then, wife and hound, And his axe well helved and ground; Pluck which young men now-a-days do not possess.

He would face a hungry bear, Or a wolf-pack anywhere, Single-handed, he and hound, in the wilderness.

When he came here all was woods; Had to cope with nature's moods, Drouth and flood and wind and storm and fire:

Had to chop and hew and break, Had to stump and plow and rake, Drive the howling pack and bear from their lair. Build his home, a humble shed, Raised his oxen, made his sled: In a hollow granite boulder ground

When misfortunte knocked him out, He did not set down and pout, But was up and ready for the fray

ANNIVERSARIES SAD TO SOME

According to Professor, Those of Vio tories Recall Bereavement; While as for Tin Weddings-

"There is always an element of sadness in the celebration of an anniversary," remarked the professor, laying down his paper with a sigh. "How can you say anything so pessimistic? Why, I think anniversaries are just lovely!" cried his wife. "Only when we succeed in forgetting that they are anniversaries," retorted the professor. "The very fact that they remind us of the inexorable passage of time gives them a fundamental sadness to begin with but that is not what I meant.

"I was thinking of Mothers' day with all its reminders of bereavement, and then it suddenly occurred to me that the original occasions of almost all annual celebrations contained sadness for somebody.

"The other day came the anniversary of Sherman's march to the sea. With what feelings do you suppose - that reminder is received by survivors of the unfortunates who lived in the great general's devastating path? And so it is with the anniversaries of all battles and victories. Even the rejoicings of the victorious side are tempered with the sorrows of those who lost sons in the conflict."

"Some anniversaries are sad," confessed the professor's wife, "like Memorial day and Good Friday, but most of them are awfully happy, like Christmas and the glorious Fourth."

"Please don't remind me of those most melancholy festivities, Isolde, groaned the professor, "with their artificial and unwholesome stimulation of the young and their inescapable depression of the er-middle aged." "Well, at least you will admit, dear," said Isolde, "that wedding anniversaries are happy occasions." "Ghastly!" cried the professor. "I never remember being so wretched in my life as I was at the tin wedding you insisted on our inviting our friends to. Really, my treasure, I trust you will never do that again." "Of course not," said Isolde sharply. "We couldn't have another tin wedding, but we'll have a silver wedding when the time comes, and meanwhile I think we'll be having an aluminum wedding, or a silk wedding, orin fact, just as many anniversaries as we are entitled to."

"Heaven help me!" cried the professor. "For my part I feel with the poet that, 'The holiest of all holidays are those kept by ourselves in silence and apart. The secret anniversaries of the heart!"

Effect of Franz Liezt.

Autograph letters, trinkets and other articles associated with Franz Liszt have been brought to this country by Rudolph Siegel at the request of the composer's heirs, remarks the New York Herald, for whose benefit they are to be sold.

Included in the collection of eighty items is a death mask and a lock of Liszt's long gray hair. The genuineness of the latter is attested by Lena Schmalhausen, who was the house keeper at the Liszt home at the time of his death, in 1886. The cast, which is in a glass case, is in excellent condition. A prayer book, much used and worn by the great composer, is an item closely woven with his life as the two presentation books given to him on his seventieth birthday,

October 22, 1881. One of these books contains many autographs of musicians who were famous during this period. In it Hans von Bulow, eminent planist, is represented in two separate autographed notations. Translated from his script, which is in German, they read: "As soon as we artists are able to emancipate ourselves from the plebelan vice of envy and fear we will be enabled to consider ourselves the pinnacle of aristocracy and music as photographic reproduction of the acoustics of eternity." Thirty letters in French and thirteen in German comprise the collection of letters, among which is correspondence from Theresa Carreno, Carl

Tausig and Pablo de Sacrasate,

Rats Infest English Town. A Nottingham (Eng.) municipal medical officer has this to say about rats in his city: "A half million rats, some two feet long and weighing two pounds, inhabit the prehistoric subterranean passages of the city. They would attack elephants. They have killed and devoured mongooses, ferrets and wildcats, and men do not dare invade their haunts. An underfed female cat alone is superior to a big rat. The city tried poisoning them, but the rats quickly discovered the food was tampered with and they refused to eat it." Asphyxiating poison gas has been suggested to rid Nottingham of the horde of rodents.

There are four models of the Gulbransen. The Player action is practically the same in all, the difference in quality being found in the materials and finish of the Piano.

The GULBRANSEN

The Player-Piano that has swept away the prejudice and popular misconception about Players. Its popularity has necessitated the largest player factory in the world, with a total capacity of 150 instruments daily-present output almost 100 daily and Two Months Behind in Deliveries.

Like most seemingly marvelous inventions, the basic principles of the Gulbransen are just SIMPLICITY You simply play it like you would a Piano-use the loud and soft pedals for shading; vary the pressure on certain keys for accenting notes or chords, and play rapidly or slowly as the music requires—nothing more—so simple it seems surprising it was not done by others.

See the genuine Gulbransen display and ask to have the famous Gulbransen "Ten-Minute Test" at--

And the wonder of it is anyone can do it-not only musicians or salesmen. In three minutes after you sit down at a Gulbransen we can have you accenting individual notes as though you struck them with your finger. In ten minutes we can prove to you that you can play the Gulbransen and deceive even Musicians.

Home Instruction

And, most important, this demonstration does not end at our store. With every Gulbransen is included a set of four remarkable "Instruction Rolls" that teach you at home. If you will practice conscientiously with these rolls for a short time, you will acquire absolute mastery of the player and then you will begin to experience the real thrill of self-expression in music, beside which no other sport in the world can compare.

Just Hear It Once

Printed claims always sound exaggerated. The only way to really appreciate the possibilities of this Super-Player is to see it, hear it, test it and compare it with anything you have heard before.

Not At All Expensive

Although the Gulbransen is believed by many to be the greatest Player made, it is also the least expensive. The very simplicity which has increased its effectiveness and durability has also made it cost less, so you can actually save money by getting a Gulbransen.

And, best of all, it is Nationally Priced! The same price all over Canada. You can send a child to purchase a Gulbransen just as you would a phonograph record, because it is One Price.
