MUST EXTEND A STREET

In Order to Improve the Fire Protection at Frontenac School.

The civic fire and light committee met on Tuesday afternoon and discussed the matter of better fire protection for Frontenac public school. This protection can only be given if the city council opens up Cowdy street from its dead end at Adelaide street and extends it to Stephen street, so that a complete water main service can be arranged. Some land will have to be purchased or expropriated. The matter will be considered by the Board of Works.

Chief Armstrong reported on the work done by the committee during the year, showing the additions to the street lighting, etc. Twelve new arc lamps have been added and several changed to better positions; thirteen new tungsten lamps have also been added and three more are yet to be placed; one additional hydrant has been erected, and six new fire alarm boxes have been placed. The committee, the chief reports, will end the year with a small balance on hand.

It was decided to put a new fire alarm box at the corner of Hickson avenue and Montreal street for the protection of the industries in that district.

Temporary repairs will be made to the floor in No. 2 fire station. A cement floor will be required next spring.

In attendance were Aids. Chown, chairman; Godwin, Holder and Johnston.

FISH STORY FROM BAY OF QUINTE DISTRICT

Old-time Fishing Days Return—What a Fish Hatchery Will Do.

The good old fishing days seem to be returning to the Bay of Quinte. Saturday a crowd of people on Front street, Belleville, opposite the City Hall had a sight of a fish, whose kind once infested the waters of the Bay of Quinte and deposited their spawn on the rocky bottom of the Moira River.

In the government pound nets off Gull Island, near-Ox Point, was found a three-year-old spring salmon, weighing fifteen pounds and measuring thirty-two inches long and 9 inches through. It is a light watery weed green in color, with eyes bulging, small and as if overlaid with gold leaf, fine thick, tall large, the back mottled with darker spots. The fish has large teeth and purple grey mouth. Several of these fish have been caught this season in the bay, weighing fifteen to twenty pounds.

Charles McKenzie, a local artist, told the Ontario that this fish in the old days was caught as far up as the lower bridge in the Moira. It is thought that lumbering and sawdust drove them out. The department has been depositing salmon fry here. "In four or five years we shall be able to catch these fish in the bay without having to go to the maritime provinces," stated Mr. McKenzie, who was engaged making some sketches of the government hatchery in Thurston. He recalled how the late William Wallbridge had heard his father tell of buying one of these fish up town, it having been caught by the lower bridge, the purchaser, who was not a tall man, having to hold his arm high to lift the fish's tail off the ground.

The scientific name of the spring salmon is Oncorhynchus tshawytscha. In India the fish is known as the oye kato and the Salmon River as oye karone (the region of the salmon).

The presence of this splendid sample of fish is an illustration of the success of the work at the hatchery here which is in charge of Mr. Oakes, the spawn having been deposited only three years ago.

SOUTH SEA STORIES.

Life Among a People Who Use Tobacco as Money.

Amongst the inhabitants of some of the more remote Fijian islands in the South Pacific Ocean, ordinary money is unknown, its place being taken by plug tobacco; so many sticks being worth one pig or one wife, as the case may be.

One day a trading schooner put in at Apemama Island having on board a goat, a beast never before seen by the astonished eyes of the natives.

To please the "king" of the place the trader made him a present of the animal, which, as is the playful habit of goats, had been accustomed to chew up anything offered to it, even tobacco.

"What do you feed it on?" asked the king.

"Tobacco," replied the schooner's captain, in mischievous mood, and thereupon handed it a stick, which he promptly ate up.

"Take it away!" cried the horrified king; "I shall be ruined in a week!"

The above is one of many good stories told by Col. T. R. St. Johnston, formerly District Commissioner for Fiji, in his newly-published book entitled, "South Sea Reminiscences."

The Fiji Islands lie almost exactly opposite England, so that—as the author quaintly expresses it—if you put a corkscrew in at the Criterion in London it would come out at Mac's hotel in Fiji.

Owing to the strange geographical position of the group, it is possible for the dwellers on certain of the islands to sleep with their heads in Monday and their feet in Tuesday.

This sort of thing led to all sorts of evasions as to Sunday trading and liquor selling after hours, so that eventually a new law had to be passed making one date universal for the whole colony, thereby saving the magistrates whose duty it was to administer the old law, from going stark, raving mad.

Medical men in England just now are trying to impress upon parents the importance of not underrating the danger of measles. In this connection it is instructive to note that the disease can accomplish when it breaks out as an epidemic amongst a people hitherto immune from it.

It was in 1875 that the complaint was first introduced into the islands, and, finding a virgin soil, at once assumed an extraordinary virulence. In a few months it actually killed no less than one-third of the whole Fijian race, and in proportion to the size of the nation it thus became one of the worst epidemics known to history.

Somewhere in Fiji there exist rich gold deposits, but no-one knows their whereabouts, for the natives are extraordinarily reticent regarding this one subject. Col. St. Johnston tells of the following remarkable incident.

One day a trader brought him two specimens of quartz richly veined with gold. They had been hidden in a cave of a number of bags of copra (dried coconut) brought in by some natives; the object being, not to smuggle the gold, but to add to the weight of the contents of the bag, and so defraud the purchaser.

The colonel himself tested the specimens, which proved to be very rich indeed in the precious metal. The trader at once began to make inquiries as to who had put "stones" in the sack of copra, but the natives imagined a trap, and not one would own up, despite his offer of "no awkward questions and a rich reward." And to this day the mystery has never been solved.

Preaching by Practice.

Pews by day that become couches by night may be seen in the church of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, in Trafalgar Square, London, England.

For this is a church that practices what it preaches, and, in providing a night's rest for the homeless wanderers of the streets, it is following the old tradition founded round the name of St. Martin.

St. Martin was the son of an officer in the Roman army, and, as a soldier, he served in France nearly sixteen hundred years ago. During one winter, when men were perishing of cold on all sides, Martin was in Amiens, and an old beggar, nearly dead with cold, approached him, craving alms.

The young soldier's sole worldly possessions were a cloak and his sword, but with one slash of his sword he slit the cloak in two and, throwing one half over his own shoulders, he placed the other half on those of the beggar.

Later, in a dream, it was revealed to him that he had divided his cloak with Christ.

That is the legend; and to-day St. Martin's Church lives up to it by caring for the homeless.

All sorts enter these doors at night—a strange contrast to the respectable throng who attend the services in the daytime—and a deacon or deaconess is ready with a rug to cover over any weary man or woman who cares to rest in the pews.

Throughout the night, in the dim light, an attendant walks around, passing with silent footsteps down the aisles, watching over the sleeping forms.

And only when the light of day slips in through the windows does this house of refuge become once more a house of worship.

Several explanations have been put forward for this expression.

Once it was the custom in many parts of the country for a lad to present his beloved with a "love spoon." These quaint utensils, now much prized by curio collectors, were hand-made, and often beautifully carved, and consisted of a single stem with, generally, two bowls.

This gift was accepted as the preliminary to serious betrothal, and so "spooning" acquired a very definite meaning.
