

SIX-YEAR-OLD HAD BRONCHITIS EVERY WINTER

Bronchitis generally begins with chills, followed by fever and a harsh, dry, hacking cough.

All those who are troubled with bronchitis will find in Dr. Wood's Pine Syrup a remedy that will stimulate the bronchial organs, subdue the inflammation, soothe the irritated parts, and loosen the phlegm.

Mrs. Oliver C. LePage, South Rustico, P.E.I., writes: "My little six-year-old girl had very bad attacks of bronchitis every winter. In the evening and during the night, she would have fever and choke up, and had a wheezing in her chest.

The Funny Side of Things

Englishmen, as a rule, in traveling are very reticent, and in this respect quite unlike foreigners.

"On one occasion," writes Sir Lees Knowles, in "Fun, Fact, and Extract," "I was traveling from Manchester to London in a first-class railway carriage, and opposite to me was, apparently, a Manchester business man.

"Neither had said a word to the other. When we were a short distance south of Weedon the train passed the spot where two days after our marriage my wife and I were thrown down the embankment in an accident to the Irish express.

"I told him the story, and when I had finished his only comment was: 'It would startle you, wouldn't it?' And what was all the conversation during a journey of four hours!"

The following account of the story of Balaam and his ass is extracted from the exercise-book of a third-standard boy:—

"It was about an ovid gentleman as was a-wallopin' of a donkey, and as the donkey was stupid, he whacked it with a stick. The donkey ran agin a wall and squeezed the gentleman's leg, and he walloped it then and no mistake and serve it right. Then the donkey began to speak and told him he was wicked to serve him in this ere style, and an angel came down and took sides with the donkey and preached a sermon to the ovid gentleman and they all went away jolly."

There is a story told about a northern bishop that, when he was on one occasion about to stay the night at a particular vicarage, the vicar, who was anxious that everything might be in order, called at the palace to inquire what he could do for the comfort of his guest.

He met at the palace a young man whom he took to be a private secretary, who informed him that the bishop was very particular about what he took to drink, and he suggested that the vicar unostentatiously might give him a choice.

As matter of fact, the bishop was a teetotaler, and when he was shown into his bedroom he was horrified with the innocent display of hospitality, as a joke had been played upon the unsuspecting vicar by the bishop's son.

On one occasion another bishop was visiting one of his clergy whose wife was away from home. As, however, the bishop was staying only one night, the parson thought that it was not necessary to recall his wife.

The bishop came, and the next day, as he was leaving the house, the host said, "The next time you come, my lord, I hope that you will bring Mrs. (Bishop) with you," when he was shocked to hear the reply, "Can't rough it, can't rough it!"

The parson was somewhat upset. On her return his wife inquired about the arrangements, and upon being told in which room the bishop had slept, a brilliant idea occurred to her, and she excitedly asked her husband if he had remembered to take the silver from under the mattress.

A young man who was learning to shoot was very keen about it, as he had been presented with a new gun. His father was rather anxious, and in order to induce care he told him that a gun was a dangerous weapon, and said that a neighbor, when out shooting, had hit a beater.

A well-known counsel was noted for his indifferent dressing. A friend persuaded him to go to a firm of celebrated tailors. The new clothes were sent home, but did not seem to suit him better than those he had been wearing, and the friend who had persuaded him to buy them went to the tailors to point this out.

To his astonishment, the tailor asked, "How can you expect any of his clothes to fit? When we went to measure him, he said that he spent most of his life in literary work sitting in a chair, and in a chair he insisted upon being measured for his clothes."

Two Sisters of Mercy were once shown in to see a lawyer. They urged their case, and appealed so fervently that he felt he must give them something for charity and in order to get rid of them. So to tempt them he said he would give them a sovereign for a kiss apiece.

The Sisters were greatly startled, and one said, "What do you think, Mary? Charitable object, don't you know!" And they coyly assented. He gave the sovereign and extracted the penalty.

The next morning a constable appeared and said he had arrested two begging impostors, and to the chagrin of the lawyer produced the two "sisters," who had a night's growth of hair on their faces.

"Vice-Chancellor Bacon, the last of the Vice-Chancellors, was a fine old man who lived to a fine old age," writes Sir Lees Knowles. "He was a man of strong likes and dislikes, and I remember on one occasion Mr. Lovett, who was not in his good books, was addressing the court. Mr. Lovett had a somewhat weak voice, and I remember that on this occasion he had taken the precaution of trying to improve it with a jujube."

"The Vice-Chancellor listened to him for some time, and then, leaning forward, exclaimed, 'I wish you would not whistle at me, Mr. Lovett.'"

Betty Takes A Strange Ride.

"Oh dear," growled Betty, as she trudged home from town. "If there's one thing I do hate to do it's to walk. My feet hurt, and—" here Betty stopped short, for Goombeback, the little travel elfin, hopped down on the road right in front of her.

"Well, of all things, Goombeback, where did you come from?" she laughed, helping the little elfin dust off his clothes.

"You don't mean where did I come from," he laughed merrily. "You mean where am I going. Be honest and confess."

"Well, where were you bound for then?" Betty laughed. "I hope you'll walk a little way with me so the road won't seem so long."

"Better plan than that," suggested Goombeback. "You come with me, I was just going on an errand myself." And before Betty could ask where he was going she was whisked through the air, over mountains and seas, and when she was set down on the ground again it was in a strange country.

"Can't you tell by the dress that little girl has on where we are? I'm quite sure you've studied about her in your school books," whispered Goombeback as the little girl turned the corner and was joined by her brother.

Their little yellow faces brightened as they spied Goombeback and Betty, and they came trotting over to shake hands.

The little girl wore a tiny cap covered with bright beads, and her long black hair braided in a braid down her back flopped around as she ran. She had on a little pink satin jacket and wide pantsalets of dark red. Her coat fell to her knees, and her pantsalets almost touched her gay colored silk stockings.

The little brother wore a bright blue gown embroidered with flowers. This came to his knees. Down from under it peeked blue silk trousers tied tight around his ankles. His stockings were white, and his shoes were black cloth with thick white soles.

"I know," laughed Betty, as Goombeback introduced them. "You are little Chinese children. I've seen your pictures in my study book." This seemed to please them very much, and they shook hands with Goombeback and Betty. Not as we shake hands, but by holding their two thumbs together and shaking them up and down.

Betty fixed her hands the same way, shook them up and down, and laughed merrily.

"I was on my way here and found Betty crying because she had to
