"FIGHTING MAC"

By Fred James in "The Listening Post."

Some men are of the manner born, or in other words nature designed them for the position or job they fill in life. Take Major General Sir Archibald Cameron Macdonell, K.C. B., C.M.G., D.S.O., for example, who, from June 1917 until demobilization of the C.E.F., commanded the First Canadian Division, the "Old Red Patch" and is now Commandant of the Royal Military College, Kingston, Ontario. He is a notable example of the axiom, "Nature intended him to be a soldier." He has every attribute required or expected of an officer in that profession. There's something that snatches of the gallant, aggressive and robust in the name Macdonell. Many of his former brothers in arms call him "Fighting Mac," but he is more widely known by the affectionate sobriquet of "Old Mac," though he is not old for he will not reach the three score year mark until next October. He is as virile and confident as any man half his age.

"Old Mac" is a man of pronounced likes and dislikes. He has an affection for the R.M.C., that like his affection for the Old First Division, is as intense as a young man's first fancy for a maid, only it is incomparably more steadfast. Which of the two can claim first place in his heart and mind I have never asked him. He loves them both so ardently and devoutly.

He is also a creature of curious emotions. Didn't he, a Macdonell, marry a Campbell, Mary Maud Flora, daughter of the late Lieut. Colonel J. T. Campbell, of the 72nd Highlanders and Royal Fusiliers. However, that young imp of Venus has often been responsible for ending old feuds. I saw him choking with emotion as the Olympic steamed away one day in April, 1919, from the dock at Southampton with units of the "Old Red Patch" aboard. "Good Old Mac" chorused the troops as they waved their farewell. He tried to smile through his tears as he stood at the salute on the wharf. His last, great love, with all the glory and tradition associated with it, was too soon felt, to be only a memory—true a noble one! To this day the mention of the First Division or the "Old Red Patch" in the presence of the General is the signal for him to stand to attention and his heels come together with a resounding click.

In the epilogue to his "final order of the day" to the First Division some indication of the depth of what he felt is given:

He said in part: "I cannot view the breaking up of my beautiful 1st Canadian Division, the men of the 'Old Red Patch,' with equanimity. It breaks me up too. That is the truth.

"I shall soon only be a memory to you. It will, however, I trust, be the pleasant memory of a Canadian General who believed in you, trusted you, cared for you, gloried in your steadfast courage, discipline, and truly wonderful achievements, and who hopes none of you will be the worse for being 'Macdonell's Men.'"

But he is none the less efficient as a soldier for the tenderness and affection in his character. As a matter of fact there is no more stern disciplinarian. He thrives on all that is punctilious connected with the military "game." What some may regard as "eyewash" is to General Macdonell the stuff that makes a military force efficient. It is the ultra correct to him—a kind of icing on the cake. General Macdonell left the command of the 7th Canadian Infantry Brigade to take over the First Division. When he went to bid a formal farewell to his brigade his emotion overcame him and he abruptly turned his horse about and galloped away with the tears streaming down his cheeks.

The first battle the "Old Red Patch" fought under his command was at "Hill 70," where his efficient generalship was no mean contributing factor to the success of the "show." Then followed Passchendaele where, if ever the qualities of courageous leadership were required in very unit, it was there. In his every engagement "Old Mac" demanded much of all under his command, and as they had full confidence in him and loved him, he always received a hearty response. They knew him to be a 24-carat soldier and man. When he issued an order they knew it was the result of mature consideration.

The campaign of the "100 days" in 1918, proved that the 1st Canadian Division was among the finest Divisions on the Western Front. On the 8th of August it made the greatest penetration in the German lines that was made, up to that time, on the whole of that front, a distance of almost nine miles. They followed it up the second day by another thrust of six miles. Of the 28,000 odd prisoners captured by the Canadian Corps in two months, from the 8th August, 13,000 in round numbers, or nearly 50 per cent., were gathered in by the old Division.

In the trying days of the march to the Rhine, when the Division marched 295 miles in 27 days, through the Ardennes, which has been mentioned in all Military history as a difficult country, the Division still kept up its record and discipline. There were days when the excitement of war was over, the eagerness to get home was manifest, and the day of grumbling and discord had arrived. These defects were not present in the 1st Canadian Division, and this was to a great extent due to the interest and personal supervision of General Macdonell in visiting and keeping in constant touch with the men.

General Macdonell's father was the late S. S. Macdonell, K.C., and he received his early education at Trinity School, Port Hope, Ontario. From there he went to the Royal Military College and was among the first batch of students at that now famous institution, so that he is now the head of his Alma Mater.

He got his commission in the Canadian Mounted Infantry of the permanent force in 1888. A year later he was transferred to the Royal Northwest Mounted Police. His next venture was in South Africa with the 2nd Canadian Mounted Rifles. He gained a conspicuous record in the Boer War. For his bravery he was mentioned in despatches and awarded the D.S.O.

On his return from South Africa he was given command of "C" Division of the R.N.W.M.P. When the Great War began he was in command of Lord Strathcona's horse and with that regiment he went overseas. He chafed for several months in England. He wanted to get to France. After the second battle of Ypres reinforcements were badly needed in Flanders so the Canadian Cavalry brigade volunteered for infantry duty. "Old Mac" took his cavalry men to the First Division and afoot his regiment did fine work at Festubert, Givenchy, and at Messines Ridge. When the 7th C.I.F. was organized "Colonel" Macdonell was given command and elevated to a Brigadier Generalship.

"Old Mac" is a romantic character. He is well and favorably known throughout the Dominion. He has seen civilization step into Western Canada and the wilderness step out, and moreover he has been a factor in promoting the best elements of the former.

As commandant of the Royal Military College no better choice could have been made. The fathers and mothers who send their sons to R.M.C. need have no fear nor worries but that the old General, who himself brought up one of the finest young gentlemen who ever lived and who sleeps over yonder in France, will give the attention and training to their sons as probably few other men on this continent are capable of doing. "Old Mac's" principal diversions are riding, Scottish Clans, on which there is no greater authority, and "reminiscing." He has a great bump of humor and is one of the greatest raconteurs in this country.

He loves all that is Scotch—even some of the Campbells—but his greatest love is Canada, for whom he has fought a great deal and has lived for consistently.
