OLDEST WOOLLEN MILL IN CANADA NEAR ODESSA

Owned by Michael Asselstine —Wool Goes to Ends of the Earth.

OLDEST AND YOUNGEST WOOLLEN MILLS HERE

The Kingston district has not only the oldest woollen mill in Canada, situated near Odessa, but it has also the youngest woollen mill—that of Collier's Limited at Kingston Junction. The latter has got away to a good start and is increasing its staff of expert weavers. It promises to become one of Kingston's very best industries.

C. Roy Greenway in Toronto Star Weekly.
For hundreds of miles people come on purpose to buy woollen bairns for comforters and other staples to the oldest woollen mill in Canada, the Asselstine Mill, near Odessa, fifteen miles west of Kingston.

"Where do you think these are going?" a woman asked Michael Asselstine, the owner, a few days ago. She was fingering the white, fluffy heap of bairns, almost as famous as eiderdown for bedspreads, which she had just bought. "To Japan," she added. She was a missionary. In two weeks she will be sailing from a Pacific port with some of old Mr. Asselstine's famous wool.

A chance meeting on the streets of Kingston brought up the fact of the old mill. Among the people of Kingston who acted as hosts to the Ontario Historical Society at the recent annual meeting held at Kingston this year was a big fair, genial man. Listening to a discussion about the old things of the vicinity, he suddenly broke into the conversation, and suggested: "Why don't you go out to see the oldest mill still standing in Canada?"

The natural question then followed: "Is it still running?"

"This suit that I have on," the stranger replied, fingering his grey coat, and holding it out proudly for inspection, "was made there."

Later on, it proved that the broad-shouldered man was Tom Asselstine, as he is familiarly known, the clerk of the high court at Kingston.

You come suddenly upon the old weather-beaten frame building as you round a bend in the road. Spreading trees shade it and give it a peaceful, old-world, atmosphere. On the east, the Odessa stream, which comes through Sydenham, forms the millpond, and flows through the ancient sluiceway to turn the wheels of the machinery inside. Not many miles in Ontario are left that use water-power.

As one approaches the old building with Mr. Asselstine, about the first thing one sees is the wool drying and bleaching on a sort of platform at the front second-storey door. Long tails of it hang from the sides of the doorway and the claspboards, swaying from side to side as the wind puffs through them.

The whole history of woollen manufacturing in Upper Canada is around Mr. Asselstine's mill. It was on this site that Isaac Fraser built the first mill in 1810. Michael Asselstine, father of the present proprietor, bought it. Close by the mill tower the old stone foundation is still standing. The present building dates from 1853. Mr. Asselstine tells you that he had owned it since 1846, the year before Confederation.

You go into a dark lower story through the front door under the platform. It is heaped up with wool in bags. Then you look up and stare at the huge pine beams, each of them rough-hewn with an axe, twelve inches square and as wide as the building, thirty-six feet in all.

The machinery is all upstairs. It is quite modern. But Mr. Asselstine spoke with pride of having owned the first cards in Canada. "I sold them to Brown Bros., who owned the Toront. Mill, eleven miles north of Niagara," he said. "I put the cards in upstairs in '78. They were Knowles looms—wonderful inventions in those days."

The deep silence of the summer afternoon was broken as a sort of automobile eiderdown wheel in an apparent wooden box was turned, and the big wheel down in the sluiceway below began to turn, and the machinery in its turn. The long grey and white ropes of wool stretching from the first machine began to move on the journey that would take them into yarn.

All summer the mill is silent. It is only from January to June that the spinning goes on now. Modern competition on a big scale and the piling up of the years have slackened its production appreciably. It is more of a hobby with Mr. Asselstine now, for he is 77 years of age. There was a time when, as a young man, he used to make 100 pounds of wool yarn a day. Once the mill would handle 30,000 pounds of wool in a season. Now 10,000 pounds is the average amount.

Large scale manufacturing may have made it unprofitable for the old mill to make anything any longer, but with woolen bairns for bedspreads, sheeting and yarn, it can still hold its own. People prefer to come great distances to get the Asselstine wool. Even the board of trade of Winnipeg has yarn sent from this historic mill.

The whole atmosphere of the place is far removed from the hurried roar of the large industrial centres. The old mill seems to be a friend for life to the people who have worked there and become attached to the place. Mr. Asselstine likes to speak of Maggie Gibbs, still working with him in the old building. She came to him as a girl. She left to marry, but when her husband died, there was still the old mill. She came back. Now, as a grandmother, she is working there yet. Mr. Asselstine's mother, who once lived in the shadow of the mill, is living in Kingston today, a remarkable woman of 93 years.

TRAFFIC "COPS" ON DUTY ON PRINCESS STREET

Two Busy Corners Were Well
Looked After On Saturday Night.

The police department had two men on Princess street Saturday night, regulating traffic, and citizens are well pleased with the result.

One man stationed at the corner of Bagot and the other at the corner of Montreal, two of the busiest corners in the down-town district. The traffic on Princess street has increased a great deal, and it is believed that the action of the police department in having two men placed at these corners on Saturday night will go a long way towards checking accidents.

There are many auto drivers who are very careless travelling on Princess street, but with policemen at the corners they are compelled to slacken their speed.

All Saturday the traffic on Princess street is very heavy, and if the police department had a sufficient number of constables a couple could be stationed at these two corners all day.

Citizens generally are well pleased with the action taken by the police department to regulate the traffic on Saturday night, and hope that the practice will be continued. With the police department it is all a question of men to do the work, as when two constables are detailed to watch the crossings, it means that there are two beats that must be neglected.

However, with so many autos running around the city streets nowadays, it is felt that special attention must be paid to the traffic.

Napanee Scouts at St. George's.

Napanee troop of Boy Scouts, who bivouacked for the week-end on Barfield common, paraded to St. George's cathedral on Sunday morning under the command of Scoutmaster Babcock, and were heartily welcomed by the Dean of Ontario, who assured them that St. George's troop would do all things possible to make their stay in Kingston a pleasant one. Scoutmaster Perry Hall of St. George's got into communication with General Sir Archibald Macdonell, who gave permission for the Napanee lads to visit the Royal Military College, and escorted by the officers of St. George's troop, the boys saw everything that was to be seen and had the honor of meeting the commandant who himself showed them over the college.

Dead Man's Bay Sing Song.

A delightful song service was held on Sunday evening on the lawn and spacious verandah of the Crumley-Galloway camp ("The Seven Gables") at Dead Man's Bay. Over forty assembled for the singing, which all pronounced most enjoyable. Besides the community singing, solos were given by Mrs. McManus, Miss Henstridge, Mr. Galloway, Miss King, Frank Anglin and Earl Pidgeon; duets by Major and Mrs. McManus, Mrs. Galloway and Frank Anglin. A recitation by Miss Reid, entitled "The Most Beautiful Thing in the World"; short talks by Alex. Shaw and Edward Crumley, and a piano solo by Helen Anglin. The accompaniments were played by Frank and Helen Anglin. Weather permitting, these singing-songs will be continued during August.
