

The British Whig Pictorial Page

The dentist's chair would lose many of its horrors if it were known that Viola Dana would handle the instruments. The patient in the chair seems rather dubious of results.

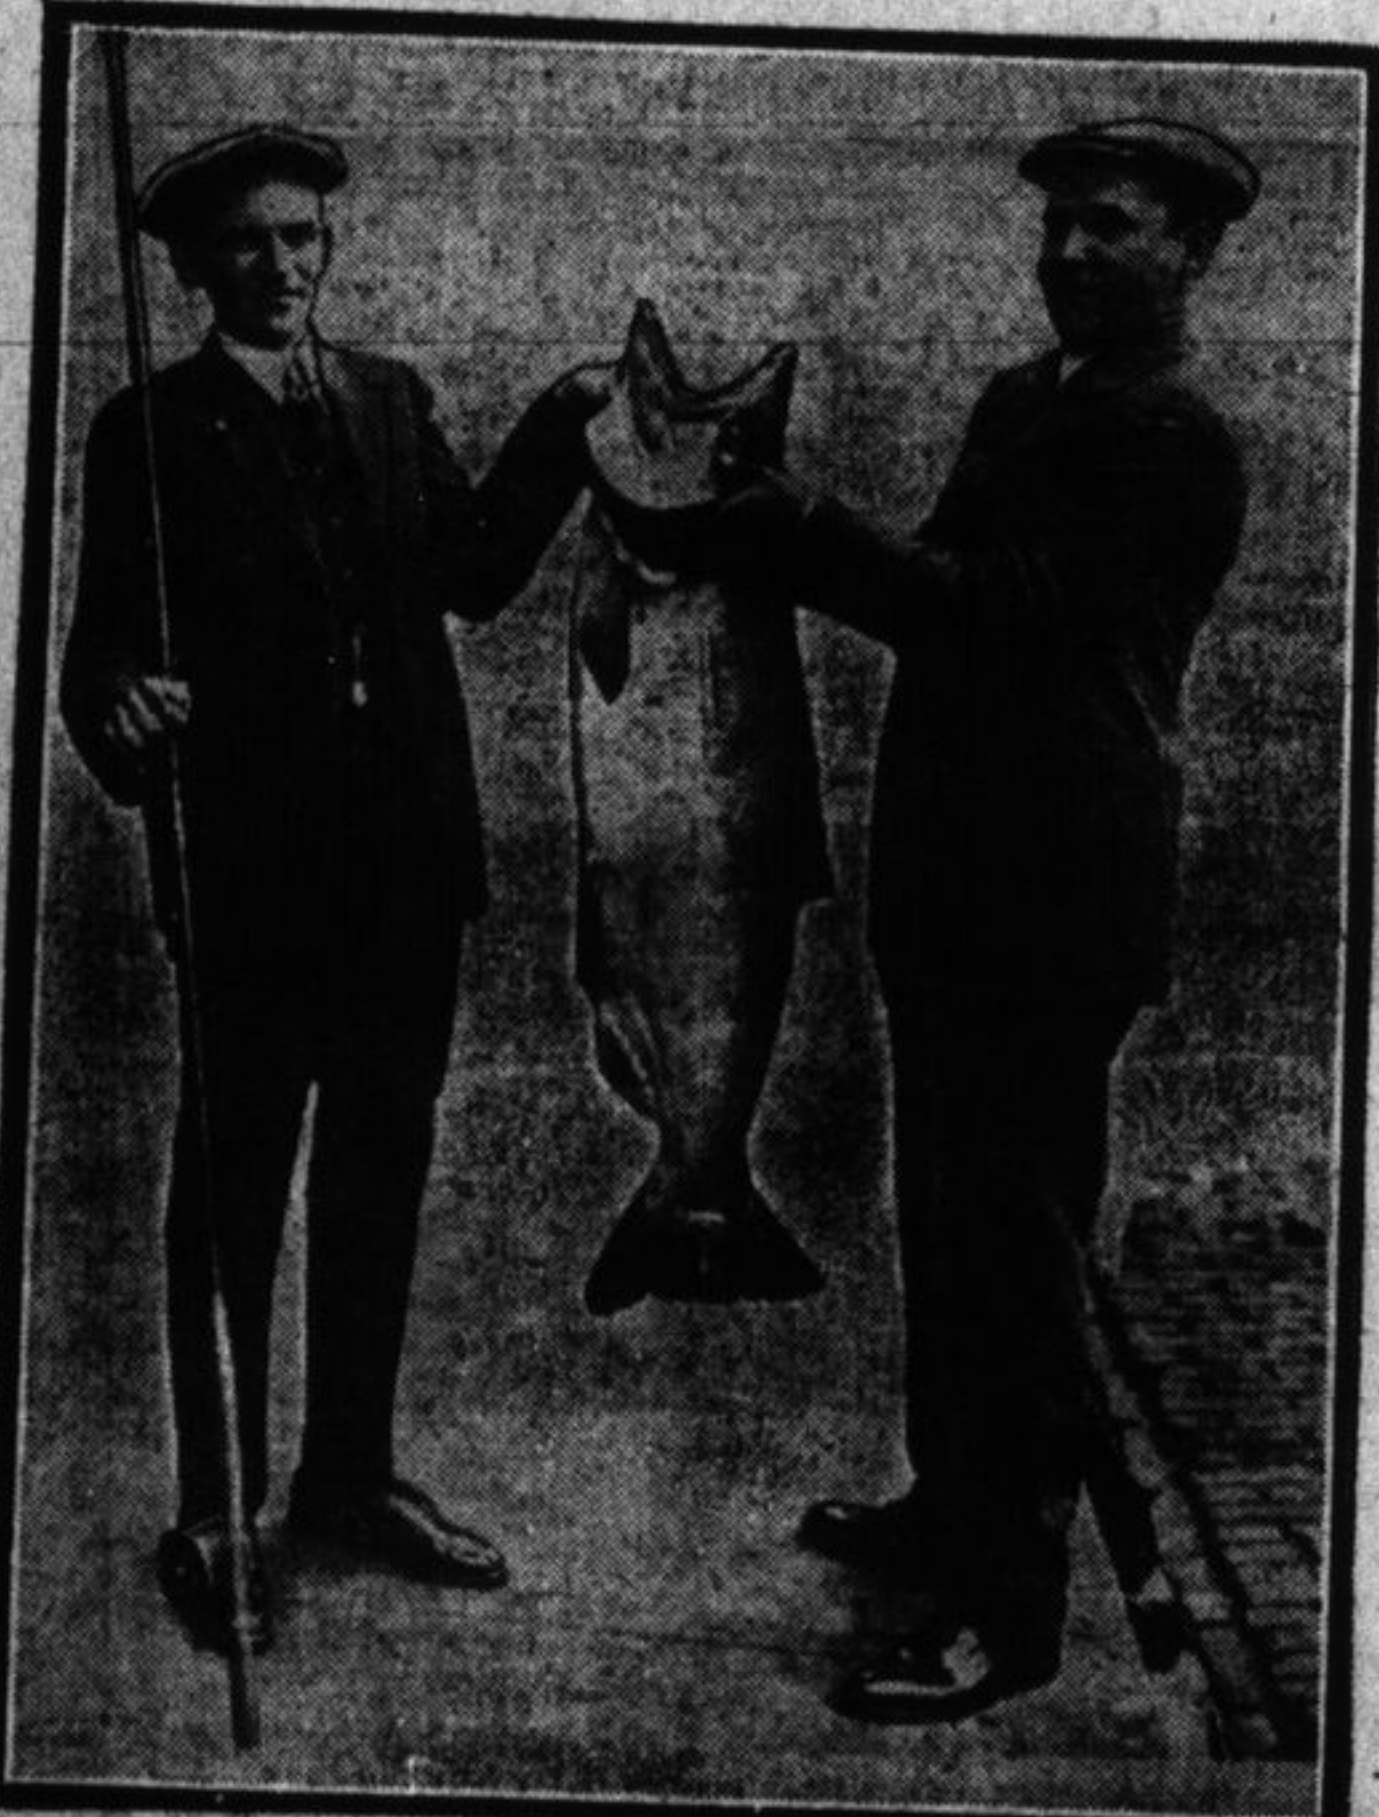

Henri Lacoste (left), schoolboy wonder of the French tennis team, congratulates Capt. James O. Anderson of Australia, who defeated him in their match in the finals of the Davis cup.

Fashion says this moleskin collaret is sure to be popular for the fall season. The large bow will have much to do with its attractiveness.

Nina Roberts of Oxford, England, after writing and publishing her story, found that only twenty-six copies had been sold. She started in selling them herself and sold 245 in three days.

This 58-pound trout salmon, caught in the Cowlitz River, Washington, was landed with a light fly rod after a half-hour battle. It is called a champion catch.

Helene Chadwick has been away from film work for eight months. In order to appear again she is resorting to strenuous methods to regain her form.

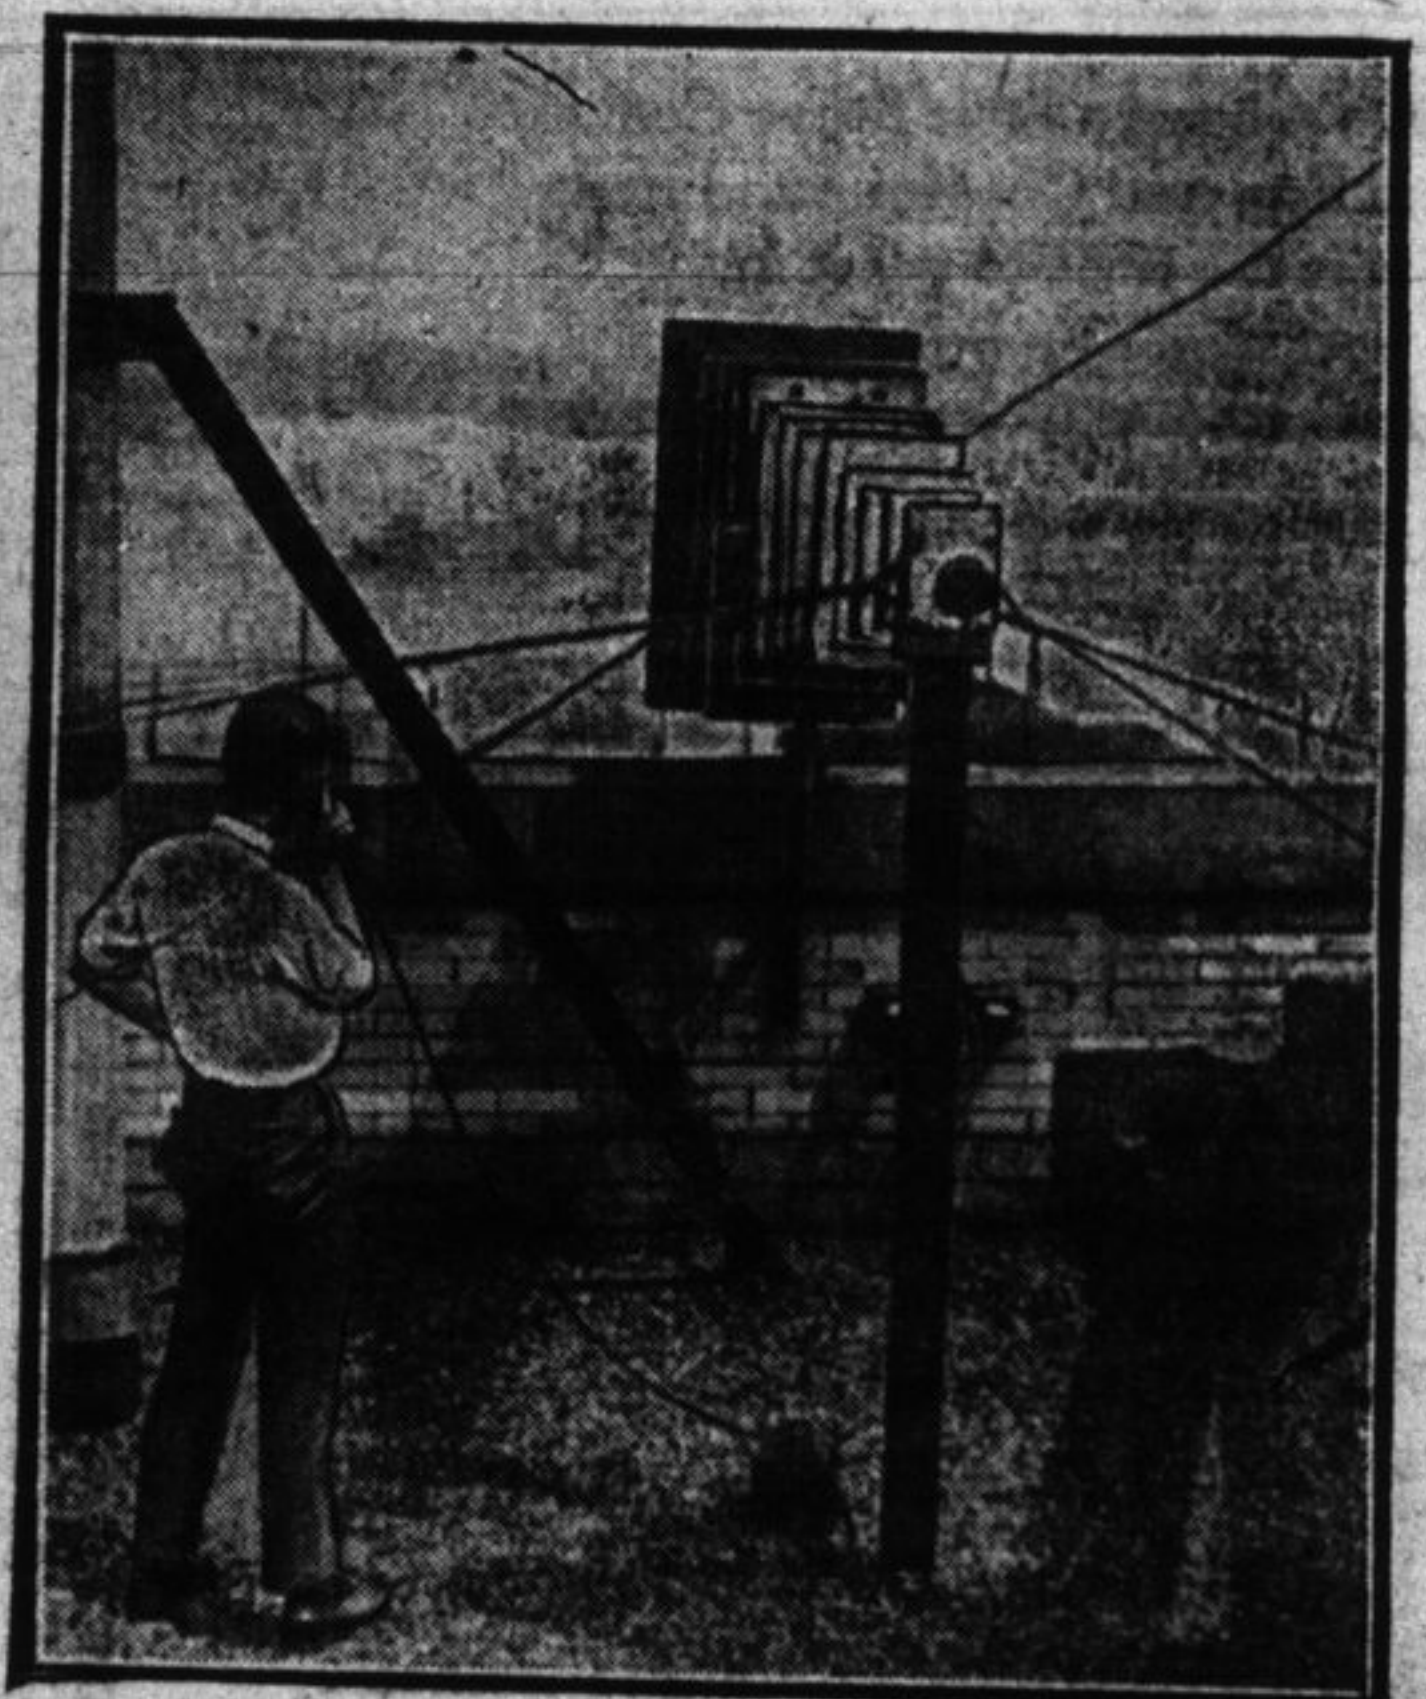

The photograph is that of Major G. R. Hennessy, M.P., son of Richard Hennessy of Cologne, France. Those familiar with a certain brand will recall the famous name.

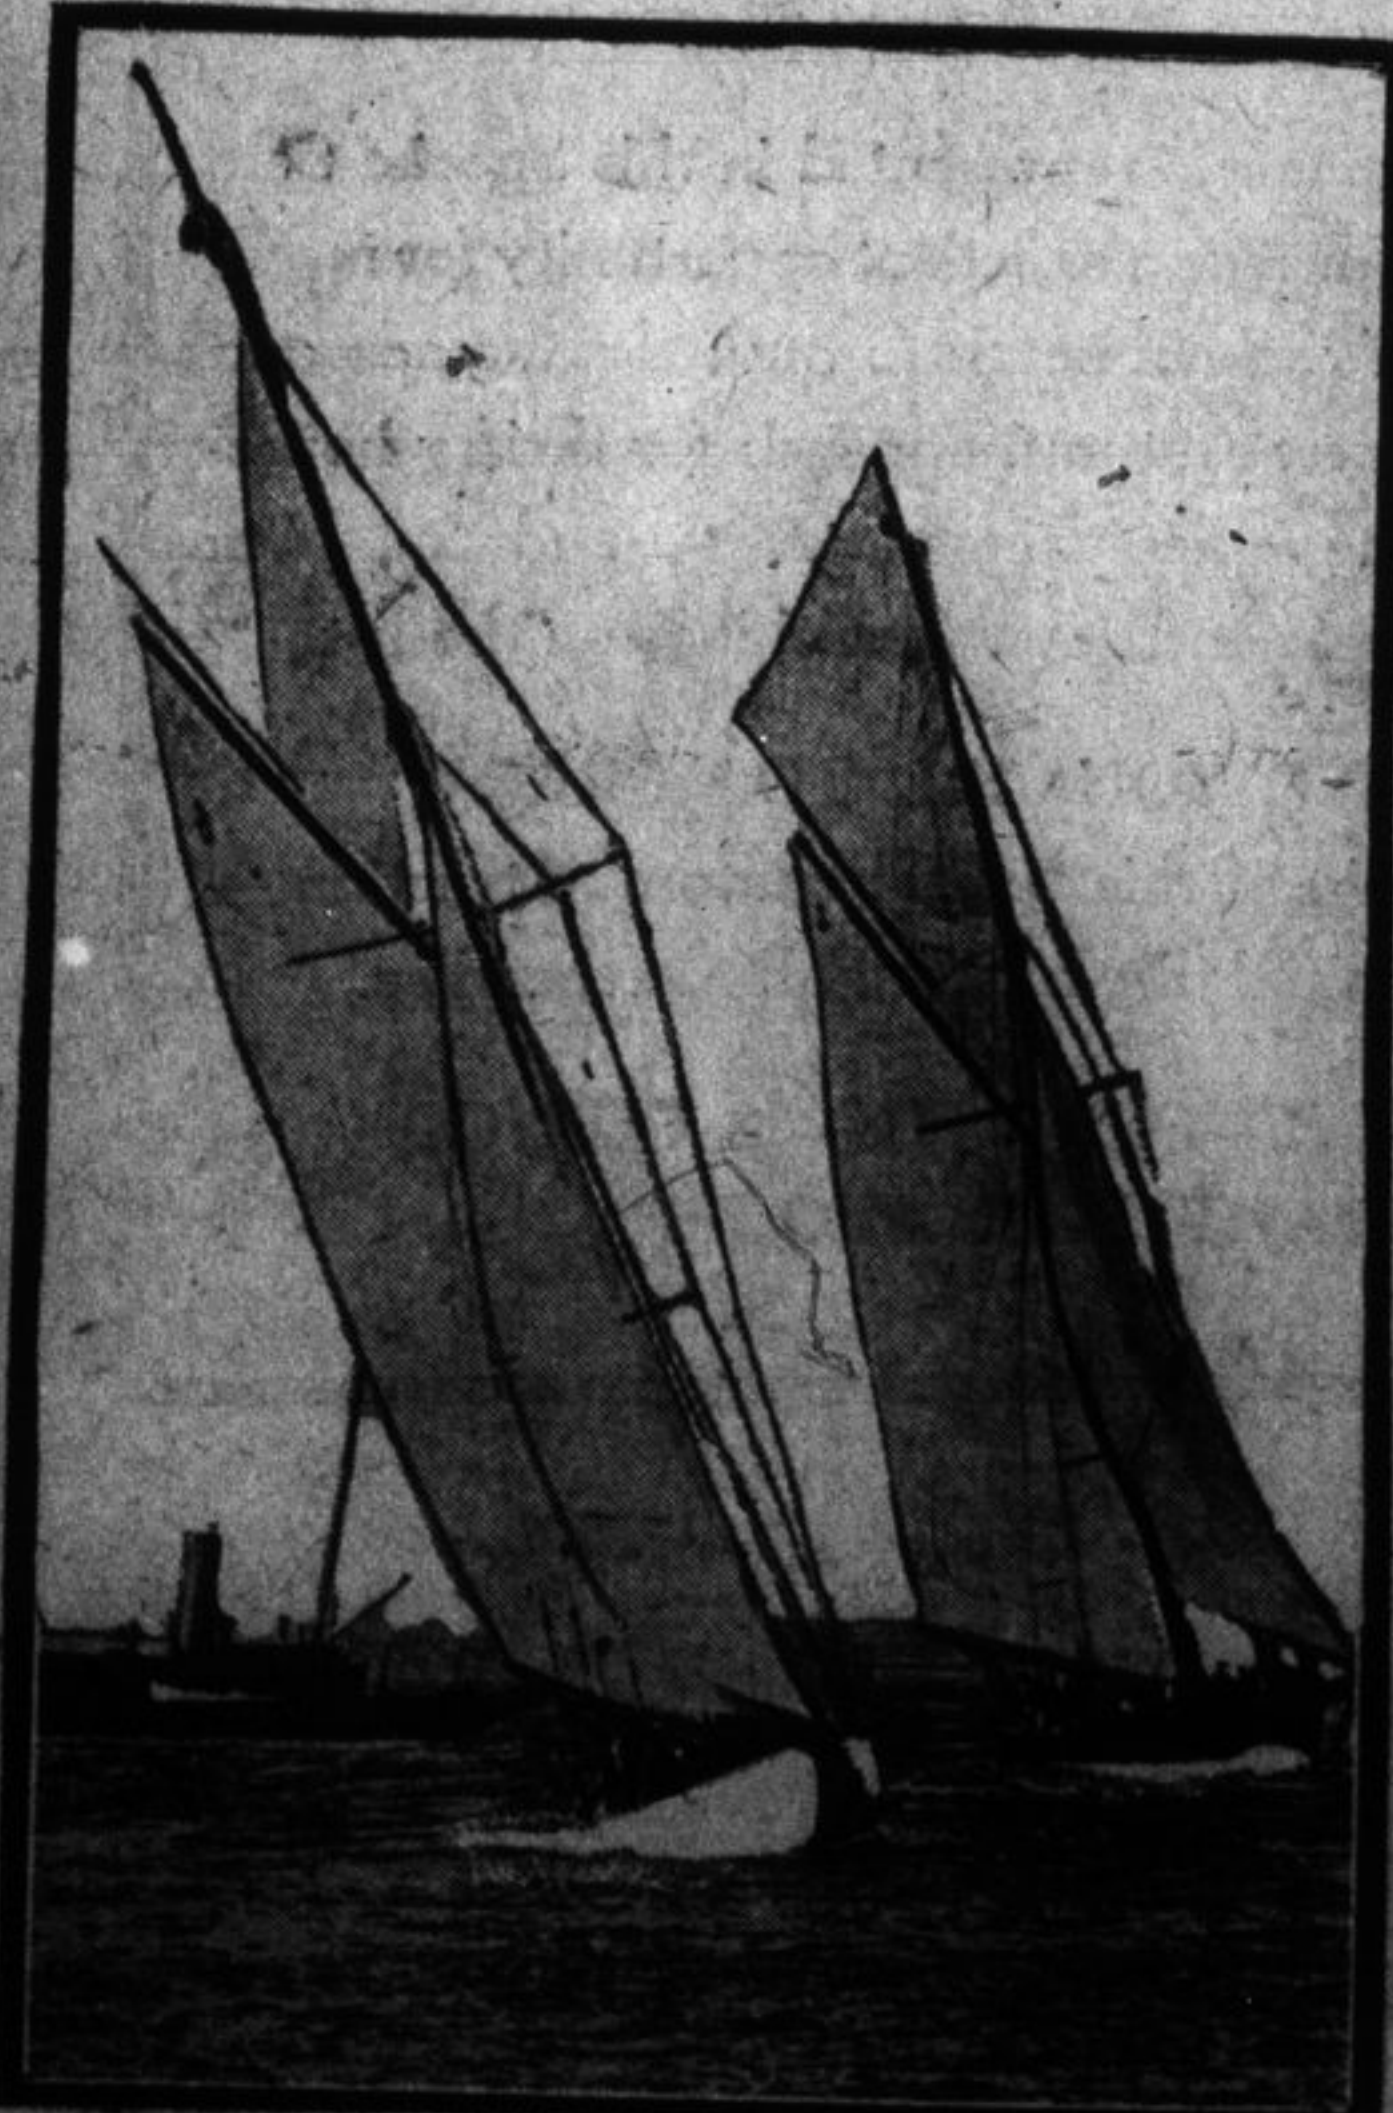

A new photograph taken of the Earl of Shaftesbury, who was recently named president of the English church union.

It's against nature, but they really are firm friends. This terrier and Australian snake have been brought up together since the pup was born.

From the roof of a New York hotel this huge amplifier was erected, which is able to carry the human voice to a ship far out in the river. The man in the picture is bidding a farewell to friends on board.

Royalty and many notables were attracted to the big regatta which was held at the little village of Cowes, Isle of Wight.

Tah Tom, who has just arrived in Los Angeles, claims to be the inventor of chop suey. He says that the dish has been spelled wrong all these years. It should be job suey—meaning mixed food.

Joseph L'Amour, motion picture comedian, and already a film actor himself, has developed "klieg" eyes, the result of working in strong artificial light.

This design on leather wallpaper is that of an Egyptian officer and his wife. The wall decoration is so coated that it is washable.