A Breakfast-Food Romance

By Clara Deland.

You'll have to come to it—why not begin today? The phaser smote Smithson in the eye as he emerged from the door of the house in which he occupied a hall-bedroom. Smithson swore viciously. "If I see that darned thing again I'll sure go crazy," he said to the old lady hurrying by. The old lady hurried faster, for Smithson's looks were wild. Every day, for past weeks, the placard about the Kibo Breakfast Food had glared at him from the boarding opposite as he emerged from the rooming house. Kibo's Breakfast Food was at that time being advertised everywhere. There were pictures of Kibo babies, reared on breakfast food, chubby infants, urchins who grinned at you—even young girls of flapper age, who had apparently spurned everything but Kibos, since their birth, and cried for it three times a day with distressing punctuality.

Smithson hated them all, principally because he was out of a job and inclined to be vicious in consequence. Smithson was a savage, untamed bachelor of twenty-nine. Women had never stirred a responsive chord in his breast. He knew two kinds—peaches and lemons. The peaches one liked to look at; the lemons made you tired. Lemons gave you the glad eye; peaches didn't. It was an elementary distinction, and not so bad for a drummer, who was by no means a bad drummer either.

He had lost his last job owing to the depression in business, and he was spending his days busily looking for another. That morning he had seen an advertisement requiring traveling representatives for an indispensable article, warranted to sell at sight, and interesting every householder.

Smithson went down on the elevated and interviewed the advertiser, a bald, plump man, with flabby hands.

"You're just the chap we want," said the advertiser. "It's Kibo's Breakfast Food. Warranted to sell at sight. Our sample packages—Smithson put up his hand. "Forget it!" he said. "I'm not taking none."

The fat man smiled. "My dear boy, you'll have to come to it," he said blandly. "Now, why not begin today?"

Smithson smote the fat man heavily upon the jaw and tumbled him into the waste-basket, where he lay yelping feebly. Then he went out.

"I'm going," said Smithson, "somewhere where nobody's heard of Kibo's Breakfast Food."

As a matter of fact, there would be nothing doing until September, and he still had a man's size wad left. He was a prudent young fellow, and had put by quite a little during his last period of employment. He decided upon an island off the coast of Maine, where only fishermen and an occasional summer visitor resided.

Next morning he stepped out of the steamship gay as a lark. There were no advertisements on the island.

There was one other boarder at the fisherman's cottage where he had elected to reside. She—yes, it was she—was a peach. There was no doubt about it. But the wonderful thing was that she gave you the glad eye as well. And somehow that eye seemed familiar.

Perhaps she didn't know she was a peach, though. Anice Mayfield was one of the simplest girls imaginable. She had blue, roguish eyes, masses of fair, soft, very fluffy hair and a figure like a peach. That is, metaphorically speaking, Anice was slim.

And for the first time in his life Smithson felt the pang of love. Women were no longer divided for him into peaches and lemons. They were divided into Anice and persimmons.

On the last morning of his stay he plucked up courage to ask her.

"I'll fix up a fine job, Anice, as 'Gee, you certainly know how to put the heart into a fellow. And soon as I get back to town," he said, "then—a nice little apartment and installment furniture and a plain little gold ring on here!" He kissed her finger. "How about it, darling?"

"Sounds good to me," said Anice cheerily. "But, darling, I admit I have been wondering why you spent so long here instead of looking for work. Of course, I know it's because of me, but—was it very practical, darling?"

"Say, Anice, if you knew how tired I've got of looking!" burst out Smithson. "And the last job—well, I'll have to tell you."

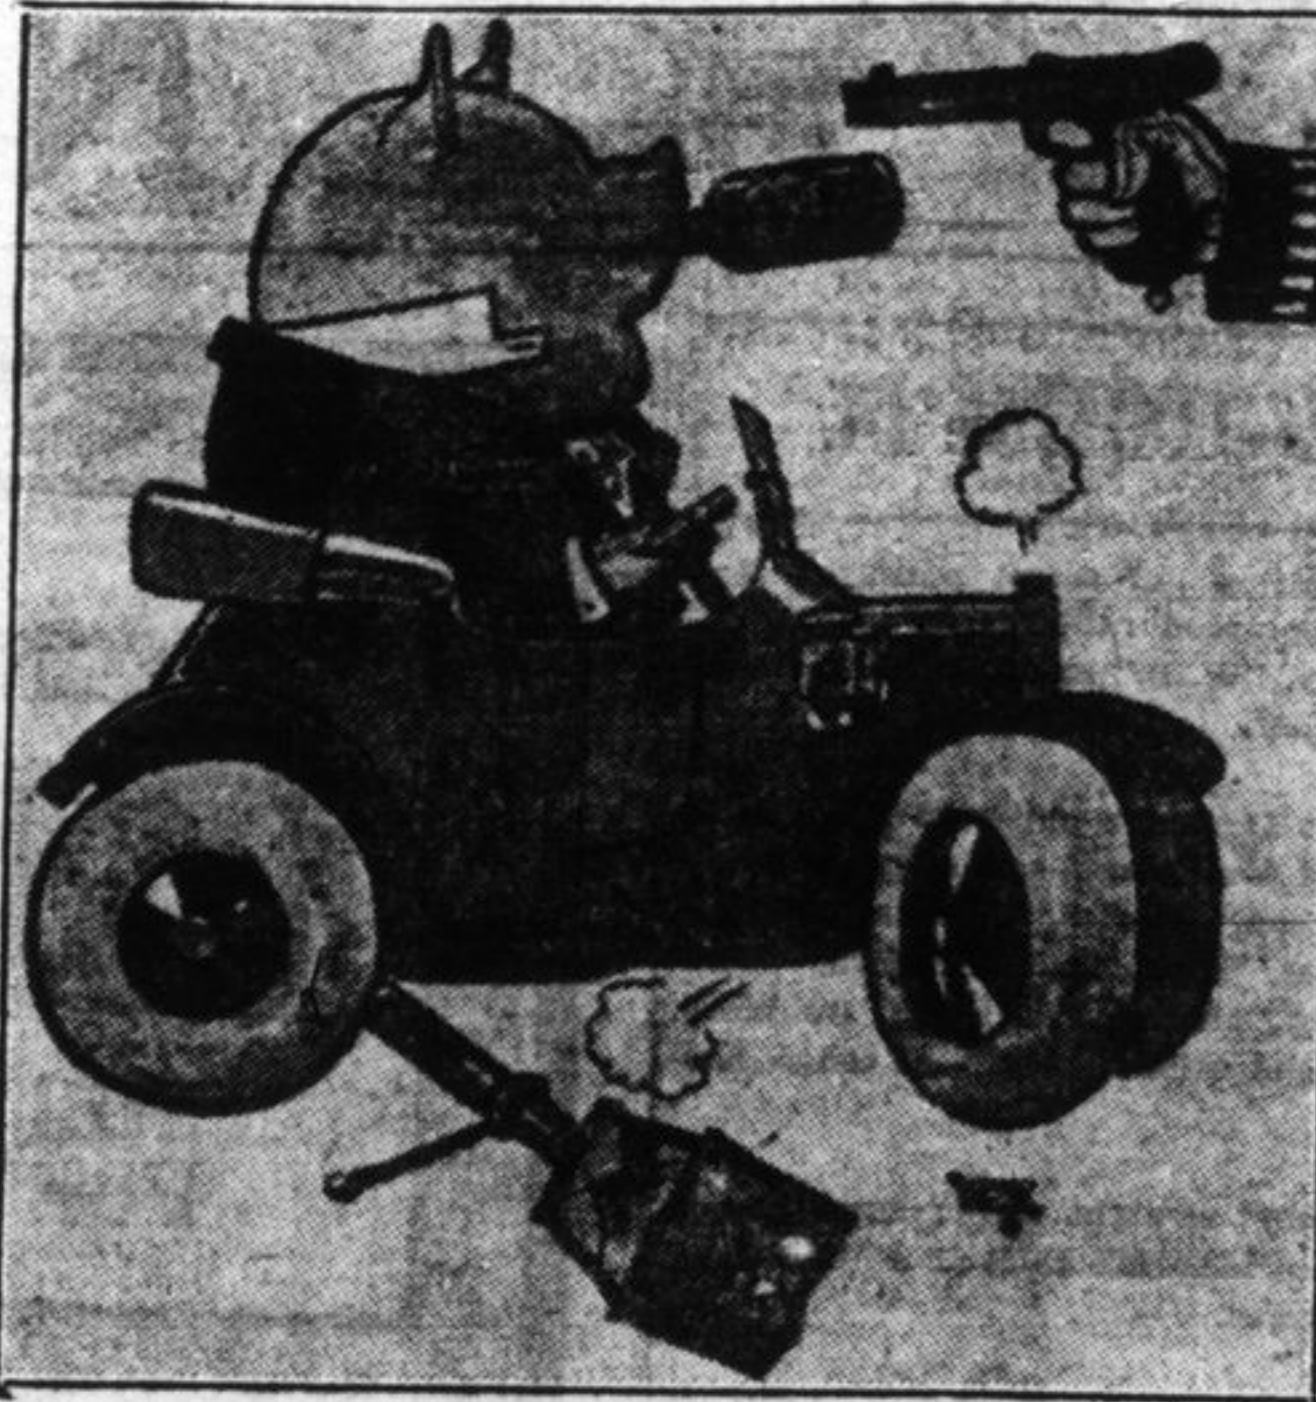

And he told her all about the persecution of Kibo's and the last job that had been offered to him. But when he had ended he was distressed to see tears in Anice's eyes. "What is it, darling?" he asked, as he hugged her close.

"Oh, John, I can never marry you now. I was—I was the real original Kibo's Food baby, and it's—It's my picture on the boardings, and—"

Well, of course they made it up. But deep down in Smithson's heart an ironical imp was singing:

You'll have to come to it—why not begin today?

May Pay Japanese The Full Insurance

London, Sept. 7.—There is a strong movement in the city of London in favor of British fire insurance companies paying their Japanese policies in full, instead of taking advantage of earthquake clauses in the policies. It is believed an attitude of generosity at this time will have far-reaching effects.

The fire insurance companies say they have no legal responsibility in the matter, and in fact, not even a moral responsibility because the Japanese did not pay the extra premium to cover earthquake damage. Nevertheless, it is thought a generous policy will be adopted.
