CHILD'S STORY OF THE HUMAN RACE

By Uncle Ray

Chapter 143—Another Great Thinker.
 There was another great man at Athens whom I want to tell you about. His name was Zeno. He used to walk back and forth on a porch near the city marketplace.

The Greek word for 'porch' was 'stoa.' The men who liked the ideas of Zeno were called 'men of the porch' or Stoics. This name has been kept and many persons of the present time call themselves Stoics.

One of the chief ideas of Zeno was that we should not let our minds be troubled by unhappy events. "Always keep yourself free from worry," he said to his pupils. "A calm spirit is worth more than silver and gold."

A drawing of a statue of this noted thinker is shown. When the statue was made, he was advanced in years. His face contained creases which made him look a bit stern, but which also marked his strong character.

There was a time when he looked very different from this. That was when he was a young man, trying to find what he should do in the world. His father was a merchant who lived on the island of Cyprus. From time to time he visited Athens. One day he brought some Greek books to his son.

If it had not been for that event, the world might never have heard of Zeno. The youth would doubtless have taken up the work of his father, spending his life buying and selling goods.

As it was, the books caught his interest. He decided to go to Athens and talk with the men who had written them. He sailed there when he was about thirty years of age, and met the authors.

For some years he listened and learned. Then he decided to become a teacher himself. His figure became familiar on the porch near the marketplace.

Zeno wrote many books, but almost all his works have been lost. In most cases, we have just the names of the volumes, but the main things he taught have come down to us through the Stoics who have lived since his time.

There were seventeen factories affiliated with the board at the beginning of the season, but only eight factories are now represented. TO RID STREETS OF MONOXIDE GAS.

Scientists have discovered that the monoxide gas, ejected by automobiles into the streets in big cities, between the walls of the buildings, has become a serious menace to public health. In the Popular Science monthly the above illustration shows how an attempt will be made to improve conditions by building the exhaust into the tops of the automobiles. Above the cars are stationary; below they are in motion.
