CHILD'S STORY OF THE HUMAN RACE

By Uncle Ray

Cross-Bows and Battering Rams.
 One of our pictures today is of special interest. It shows a device for sending arrows swiftly and true to the mark.
 The device is known as the "cross-bow" and was used by the Romans two thousand years ago. The picture is taken from an engraving, a tomb of a hunter. At the center is a quiver he used for holding arrows. Notice the strap by which it was slung over his shoulder.
 Good cross-bows are powerful weapons. The main piece of the Roman bow was so tough that the archer had to hold it to the ground with his feet when he pulled the string into place.
 Once in place, the string was held there by means of a notch. When the man wanted to fire the arrow, he simply loosened the string.
 This meant much quicker work than with the older kind of bow. It was the nearest thing the Romans had to a rifle.
 The other picture shows a battering ram. Perhaps you will be surprised to know that the image of a ram's head was once used to batter down walls.
 People noticed that the ram was mighty good at "butting," so they thought they would butt down the walls with a ram's head, made of metal and fastened to a beam.
 When soldiers attacked the city they tried to make a breach in the walls. If they had just walked up with the battering ram, they would
