CHILD'S STORY OF THE HUMAN RACE By Uncle Ray

Moving Towers and Europe's First Cannon.

Sometimes when armies attacked a castle during the Middle Ages moving towers were used. These towers were placed on wheels. They were made a little higher than the walls around the castle. They were rolled toward the walls. Archers were at the top to fire at the defenders. If a tower could be pushed close enough, a drawbridge was let down so one end rest on the walls. Then soldiers rushed across to the attack. The men on the walls might be driven off. Then the enemy would jump down and try to finish the capture of the castle.

This picture was made toward the end of the Middle Ages. It shows an attack on a castle.

Of course the soldiers in the castle did their best to keep the towers from being moved too close. Under cover of night, they might go out to try to set fire to a tower which was just being built.

If they couldn't do that, they would build ditches a little distance from the walls. The ditches would be covered so as to look like firm ground. If a tower was rolled over such a ditch, it would fall in and be wrecked.

Besides moving towers, the attackers often used little machines which looked quite a bit like cannons. They had hollow barrels, but no gunpowder was used in them until near the end of the Middle Ages.

The "balls" were good-sized stones. When the machines were "wound up," the stones could be hurled over the walls. Our picture shows an attack on a castle. Notice the large shield which protect the soldiers outside.

The little cannon looks like one of the first which were used with gunpowder and stone balls. Cities, as well as castles, were often put under attack. One of the most noted city sieges was against Prague. That was the city where John Hus went to college. The people there liked Hus. After he was burned at the stake, they tried to follow his teachings.

Both the emperor and the people became angry toward Prague. The pope declared there should be a "holy war" against the city. Two hundred thousand men tried to capture it.

Prague was so well defended, however, that the attackers became tired and marched away.

A Three-Quarter Model Achieves Distinction.

By ELEANOR GUNN

In addition to the distinction of design that marks the coats and wraps for spring, including imports and import derivations, a movement to depart from the altogether straight silhouette is demonstrated repeatedly. In making this deduction, the consideration of flares or similar substitutes is not implied, but rather the presence of incidentals in composition that tend to break the straightness of the straightline silhouette.

One of the chief methods of introducing this interruption of the straight contour is by means of the capelet in its various ramifications and again, the division of the upper and lower sections of the coat in suit outline stimulation. The capelet is treated in a slightly flared fashion appended to the back of the form of fully flared Inverness capes, used in lieu of
