With them was rounded by a quarter-mile running the band of the Royal Military School of Music.

> Royalty Arrives. A few minutes after eleven the Prince of Wales, president of the exhibition, drove into the arena and was received by the Duke of Devonshire, the whole audience rising to cheer and wave its hats and handkerchiefs. Then the trumpeters of the Guards-whose uniforms carry more gold lace than any others in the army—blew a fanfare. The first of the escort of Royal Horse Guards, in dark blue and steel, rode in under the archway, preceding three state carriages and the king's coach, drawn by six brown horses in troppings of black and gold and crimson, with postillions and outriders. The king wore the uniform of an admiral of the fleet, and the queen was in grey velvet and fur. The massed bands crashed out the national anthem, the royal standard was broken out on the dais, and the guards of honor gave the royal salute, while the great audience cheerand cheered again.

Exhibition Declared Open. The Prince of Wales read his official request that the king would declare the exhibition open, standing before his father's throne-like chair, in admiral's uniform. His first few words were lost while the multitude settled down into silence, but all the rest of the speech was heard from end to end of the stadium. The king's reply was even still more audible, amplified as it was by five instruments in the gilded balcony above
