MAXSON FORMAL JUDGES

OUT WHERE THE WEST BEGINS.

By Griffith Crawford.

Dobe Sam came ridin' from the range one summer day, Whoopin' and a shootin' down the streets of Santa Fe; Thirty minutes later he was silent as the rocks: Ridin' calm and peaceful in a little wooden box.

Alkali Ike laid down on the sand And a rattle-snake bit him smack-dab on the hand; The bite would have killed him (I honestly think), But a passing cow-puncher gave Ike a big drink.

That at first was refreshingly pleasant and cool, Then bit like an adder and kicked like a mule.

It cured him, alright, of the rattle-snake bite— But he died from the liquor the very same night.

The Revelation.

The Sunday school teacher had been telling the children about some of the Biblical miracles and had just finished with the story about the loaves and fishes, telling them how a small quantity had been divided between many people.

"Aw that ain't nothin'," piped up little Georgie in the front row. "You ought to see my mother cut pie when we have unexpected company for dinner."

—Jack Wood.

The telephone operator is the only individual who can eat onions at luncheon and get away with it.

Oh Those Flappers!

A flapper, with rolled silken hose, Went walking 'mid the garden rows.

Potatoes filled their eyes with dirt, The corn was shocked and greatly hurt.

Carrots stood rooted in the ground, While apples up a tree were found.

Cabbages covered up their heads, The lettuce lowered in their beds. While the peaches who had seen turned, with envy, a vivid green.

—B. Gandy.

Certainly.

We were joy riding, My girl of girls was at the wheel. I look at my watch, listened a bit, then murmured in her ear: "Peggy, I think we'd better head for town and stop at the first filling station."

We "headed" all right, and she stopped the car in front of a restaurant (one of the finest, too). Now, would you call a restaurant a filling station?

—Gracia Shull.

Ross Williams told us the other day: "My wife and me don't go in society much. Her hair's still long."

The Solution.

"So many men are forever complaining of domestic troubles. Now my wife had always obeyed me implicitly."

"How on earth do manage it, old chap?"

"On our wedding day, I told her to do exactly as she pleased."

—Harrison Jones.

The books of etiquette are filled with interesting information. You learn, that, when you drop a fork, you should not wipe it off upon the stocking of your hostess.

And on page 142—or is it page 241—the books of etiquette inform us that, upon pain of being noisy in our own exclusive set, when a lady enters a room, a gentleman should arise, no matter what he may be doing.

Mr. Brown was seated and he was very busy. His hands and arms and lap were full of something warm and soft and perfumed.

Nonetheless, when a lady entered the room abruptly, he arose, forgetful of his burden, allowing it to drop to the floor.

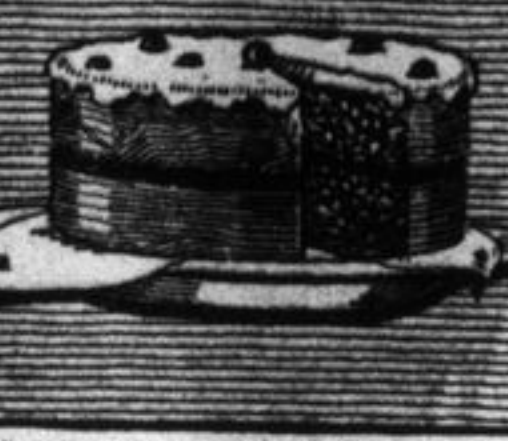

But this was not because Mr. Brown was even acquainted with the dictates of the books of etiquette.

The lady who had entered the room was his wife, and the bundle, with which he was occupied, was her pretty maid.
