A CANADIAN VIEWPOINT

The Parallel of Scotland and Canada

Wilson MacDonald, the author of the series of articles on Canadian literary topics of which this is the first instalment, is one of the most striking figures in the literary world of the dominion. He differs from nearly all of his colleagues in the poetic art in Canada in the possession of a certain fiery intensity, doubtless of Celtic origin, which contrasts markedly with the prevailing calm and respectability.

He has always been an earnest thinker on the subject of Poesy, one who regards Poesy as something far more than the mere amusement of an idle hour, as being indeed the very life of a nation's heart.

It has long been my opinion that Canada will influence American poetry inversely as Scottish poetry influenced the poetry of England, that she will save America from her artistic shallowness as truly as Scotland preserved her ancient conquerors from the "Iambic sleep."

When the academic soul of England could find absolute horror in a faulty rhyme, when she boasted of the numbers of years that Thomas Gray sacrificed at the shrine of one poem, when the regularities of a Popean brood had utterly dismayed the heart of Pan, one Robert Burns of Scotland rhymed "drumlie" with "Montgomery" and "beastie" with "hasty" and blasphemed every little tin god which England had set up on the road to rhythm.

The rhyming of "drumlie" with "Montgomery" was a proclamation of emancipation to the poets of England and the straight-jackets of a grammarian tendency were greatly loosened. The greatness of a poet is scarcely less exemplified in his own work than in his influence upon the period in which he writes.

If you bind a dance or a poem or a painting or any other artistic thing to a melody of laws the result will be a lessening of rhythm and a declining of thought. When Burns threw overboard the conventions his verse flowed as musically as "Sweet Afton" itself and his thought almost supplanted the Westminster Confession.

Again the parallel holds good as we observe the influence of American prose on Canadian prose. From "Chien d'Or" to "Maria Chapdelaine" our effect on America in this particular field has been almost negligible. On the other hand, almost every Canadian writer of prose has been influenced by its success or failure by that really notable contribution from Irving to Willa Cather.

As smoke has a more devastating effect upon an American Beauty rose than upon a wheat field, so does commercialism assail more potently the frail beauty of a lyric than it does those pages where rhyme and rhythm are absent. A country can be commercial to the core and produce great novels, but the influence of the money changers is most damning to poetry.

Hot water extraction of corns and callouses offers the only perfect way to rid yourself of these painful troubles. Take just a minute or two and spread a few drops of Putnam's Painless Corn Extractor over the sensitive surface of the corn or callous, and the pain is stopped at once.

Putnam's Painless Corn Extractor is a grand and glorious feeling that you get from Putnam's Painless Corn Extractor. It costs but little, and is sold by all druggists.

Allen to Joseph Hergeshelmer and Edith Wharton. Canadian poetry is vastly superior in quality to Canadian prose because the makers of verse in Canada are less concerned with the methods of alien poets than our novelists and essayists are concerned with the craftsmanship of foreign writers.

DISTINCTIVE AIR

This frock of beige flat crepe achieves an air of distinction by its unique insert of open-work embroidery outlined with a row of ball buttons that attach by means of loops. The dress itself, you will notice, is a perfectly straight-tube affair with a Jenny neck and very short sleeves. Detachable, but a part of the costume is the wide and very lengthy scarf of self-material edged with the ball buttons. It is worn over a slip of the same color.

Old legends tell of men who had the power to look down into the earth and see where gold and silver lay hidden.

Ardoch, July 24.—The recent rains have greatly aided the growth of vegetation. Congratulations to the Misses Nolia Weber and Margaret Scullion who were successful in passing the entrance examinations. Miss Anne Fraser is in Sharbot Lake attending summer model school. Mrs. James Denne and children have returned from a visit with her parents.
