Three-Tube Reflex Receiver Touches Peak of Duplex Amplification

Hookup Diagram of a Three-Tube Reflex Set.

By Israel Klein.
The owner of a reflex receiver, with one or two tubes for dual amplification, will find it a simple matter to add another stage of reflex. And it will well repay him for the trouble.

Three-stage reflex is practically the peak of this kind of reception. It is equal to three stages of radio and two of audio amplification, with a crystal as detector. It will tune sharply and has been found especially sensitive, bringing in distant stations up to 1,000 miles off, even through local broadcasting.

Following are the parts required:
V, standard variocoupler, with eight taps on primary.

C1, 43-plate variable condenser.
C2, fixed condenser, .005 mfd.
C3, C4, C5, C6, C7, fixed condensers, .002 mfd.

T1, T2, audio frequency transformers.
T3, T4, T5, radio frequency or reflex transformers.

R, 4-ohm rheostat.
P, 400-ohm potentiometer.

D, crystal detector.
Three tube sockets.
Switch and eight switch points.
One open circuit jack.

Binding posts, bus wire, etc., for connections.

Compact Outfit.

With extreme care and forethought, the entire set can be erected on a base 13 inches long by 7 inches wide, with the panel 7 by 15 inches in measurement. The trick lies in arranging the radio frequency transformers directly behind one another in a line leading away from the panel, then placing the three tubes alongside in a similar line and the two audio-frequency transformers in a third line.

If this arrangement is decided upon, it would be a good plan to use what is called a three-gang socket assembly, which consists of three sockets on one base. It conserves space.

Otherwise, the sockets should be placed in such a position that the grid and plate terminals face the radio-frequency transformers, which should be to the left of the row of sockets. This will put the A battery terminals to the right, and short leads would be assured to the plate and grid terminals of the radio-frequency transformers.

Since only one rheostat is provided to control the filament current, all three tubes should be alike. They may be either WD-11's, 199's, or UV-201-A's.

Condenser Control.

The 43-plate variable condenser is chosen so that a higher band of wavelengths may be covered. A much smaller condenser may be substituted across the primary of the first radio transformer, to increase signal strength for low wavelengths, but this isn't necessary if broadcasting is all that is sought.

The easiest way to wire this set is to start with the A battery leads, from the rheostat and socket terminals. Next come the grid and plate connections to the radio-frequency transformers, and the remaining leads may overlap these.

Reflex receivers require a great deal of patience in their operation. This one calls for even more than ordinary skill and patience. Many nights of testing and switching of dials and other controls will finally bring the operator full reward.

IN MARINE CIRCLES

The steamer Lethbridge passed up to Port Colborne on Tuesday. The steamer Maplebrook cleared west this morning. The steamer Maplehill passed down to Montreal. The steamer Brockville is carrying canned goods from Bellefleur and Northport today. The dredging work in the slip between the Locomotive Works and Swift's wharf is progressing well.

Released Steamers. The tug Mary P. Hall and the lighter Mamie have arrived back at the Donnelly Wrecking company headquarters after releasing the steamer Oatland, which was aground below Cardinal. It was necessary to lighten 16,000 bushels of wheat, which will be reloaded at noon today, the Oatland then proceeding to Montreal.

The tugs Frontenac and William Johnston with the lighter Cobourg arrived back after releasing the steamer Glen Ely, aground below Morrisburg. The Glen Ely was five feet out of the water and 30,000 bushels of grain were lightered to get her off. The cargo was reloaded and the steamer proceeded to Montreal.

Our "Lackawanna" coal is pronounced by experts as the very best, $16 per ton, Mitchell & Co.

PROBS:—Thursday, mostly fair and somewhat warmer. Showers by night.

Fearful and Wonderful. The Toronto Telegram has the following:

Speaking of atrocities in Russia, A. W. Haycock, Labor member of the British House of Commons, is reported to have said: "Do you know that women were murdered in hundreds and buried alive?" If Mr. Haycock has not been misreported, the Russians must be a fearful and wonderful people.

Armand Beaudrey, assistant cook on the Hydro power construction job near Campbellford, went insane and was brought to Rockwood asylum. Cheese sold at Watertown, N.Y., and Gouverneur, N.Y., at recent boards, at 19 3/4c.
