PORTABLE SUPER-HET

Sets of all kinds have been tried out for portability, but this is the first time that the superheterodyne has been made compact enough to be carried in a suitcase. Brent Daniel, who was formerly in the radio laboratory of the U.S. Bureau of Standards, did it. He is shown here with his portable seven-tube superhet, which can be carried in suitcase form with dry batteries, loud speaker and loop. He has heard Pacific coast stations from Washington with this outfit.

NOW HE'S LIKE NEW DOG!

It looked like Sport was headed for the eternal boneyard after an automobile broke his hind legs and they were dragging on the ground. But Dr. C. A. Deadman, a Madison (Wis.) veterinarian, devised this pullmobile out of some scrap iron he found in the junk yard. Now Sport can gambol with his neighbor hounds and enjoy himself.

December 18th.

When, as a result of the Pacific scandal that grew out of the railway building programme of the government which began with Confederation, Sir John A. Macdonald was forced to retire from the premiership, his place was filled by Sir Alexander McKenzie. He was the first Liberal premier of the Dominion. He coupled the department of Public Works with his own office, and thus took charge of the railway problem. He was determined to secure the consent of British Columbia to a change in the terms which had been granted as a condition of that province entering Confederation and insisted that the promise to build a railway to the Pacific be fulfilled. When the disagreement became serious the coast province sent its premier to England to protest against the repudiation of the terms of union. The Earl of Carnarvon, who was then Secretary of State, offered his services as arbitrator. His terms meant a compromise for each side, but on this day in 1874 Canada accepted them.
