Mr. Meighen, however, was never quite so much misled into the dangerous paths of Imperialism as his misleader, Laurier. As evidence of the half-heartedness of Mr. Meighen's Imperialism, Mr. Lavergne cited the Conscription Law, which was "an exemption law in reality" (we are quoting from the Montreal enjoyable as the modern movie. Gazette's report), was wanted by both parties, and was actually necessity when once Canada had entered the war. Had we not had the Conscription-Exemption Law. we must, according to Mr. Lavergne, have had "the Laurier Act of 1904 in force," which apparently would have been much worse. There has long been some suspicion that in the Province of Quebec the Meighen Conscription Act did indeed operate in some such manner as Mr. Lavergne suggests, and it is advantageous to historic truth to have the matter thus cleared up. On People are queer, and only the whole, it appears that Mr. Meighen is henceforth to be regarded as much less dangerous to Quebec Nationalism than Mr. Mackenzie King. Most of the things we long for Twenty years from now Mr. Lavergne hopes that it will be possible to have a premier less Imperialist than either Mr. Meighen or Mr. Now if you had bought all your King, but not earlier. "It will take Imperialism that the Liberals taught us," he says, referring to the Laurier tradition. All of which will be exceedingly pleasing to Mr. Meighen, if only he can go on getting credit in Ontario A movement to which we will and elsewhere for being the sole champion of Imperialism, while in Quebec he gets credit for being the best available friend of Nationalism. The strange part is that husbands But really, if Conservative newspapers are going to print in the English language these tributes which sound so lovely in French but so crude in the less delicate Anglo-Saxon tongue, what is to be done about it? Sir Robert Borden never had to put up with anything like that. The Nationalists whose assistance put him in power in 1911 never made the mistake of paying him any spoken compliments.

A MODERN JUDAS.

Canon Shatford, of Montreal, is to right when he declares: "A ily where the other is a radio fiend. mind of a child is a Judas." Iconoclasts, at the peril of dire devils, keep hands off Santa Claus. The iconoclast is a rabid red radical in the realm of sentiment. He has no imagination, and he would dogmatically, selfishly prohibit the exercise of this inner source of pleasure to others. It costs him nothing; if cannot do him harm for others to enjoy what is beyond his reach: what business is it of his that there are myths that bring joy and happiness to millions?

is no secret why right-thinking men and women have more faith in the business man than in the reformer.

It is simply an eternal admiration for the creator. The man in business is creating something. He is in the service of the people, filling a positive demand. But what is the theorist. While the business man is filling the public's order, the reformer makes orders for the public to fill. The business man renders his service before demanding his pay, while the reformer demands his pay and then promises a service.

Reformers have never been over popular, because theory is ever hypothetical and there has never been found a method of separating the the public watched the reformer is firmly established on a foundation of public service and one price. Reformers are still guaranteeing no service and claiming many prices.

Jordan Crossed. Feb. 24.-In the first division court, Anthony Jordan vs. John Counter. This action was brought by the plaintiff against the defendant on the following account: "To eight days cab driving at last-city elections, at $10 per day, £20. The defendant contended at the trial that the charges were excessive and illegal.

Judge Mackenzie's decision: The defendant and the Hon. John A. Macdonald were candidates for the representation of the city of Kingston in the parliament of the province at an election held in the month of July last. The plaintiff was employed a few days before the election by an agent of the defendant to drive the through the city in canvassing votes and to carry up voters to the poll during the election. Some days the plaintiff had one horse. other days he had two engaged. The usual price for one horse Kingston is fifteen shillings a day and for two horses twenty-five shillings a day. The plaintiff himself was examined, and he stated he was a voter of the city of Kingston at the time of the election. That he voted for the defendant at the election in question and gave him his general support. He stated further that he would have been employed by the other side, by the Macdonald party, had it not been for his engagement to the agent of the defendant, and in that case he would be a supporter of the other side. It appeared beyond doubt that his vote for the support of the defendant, rested entirely upon his employment for hire by the defendant's agent. The claim of the plaintiff cannot be entertained for one moment in a court of fustice, cause it is contrary not only to the spirit and policy of the law but to the very letter of the statute.
