versity coming back, either to see their sons and daughters graduate or to receive honorary degrees from their Alma Mater.

That a New York note says: "The Scotch tweed manufacturers are unlikely to shade their prices, but they are shading the colors of their materials. This is an innovation, for tweeds heretofore have been of the same shade from side to side. One long coat designed for the racing opening at Jamaica and brought from London is of shaded tweed deepening from a light fawn at the top to cinnamon and then to a deep brown at the border."

That the gold purple and mauve crocuses in Dr. Third's garden are at the height of their glory and worth going many miles to see. On Sunday and Monday many Kingstonsians walked along Wellington street to enjoy their beauty, and the people in the neighboring houses almost felt they had a garden of their own.

That the halls of Queen's are still once more, save for the members of the faculty of medicine who are hard at work cramming for their examination. In a week the students who will receive degrees from "Good, old Queen's," will return and their parents will come to Kingston from far and near to see the finish of years of hard work. Then, too, we will see the old boys and girls of the uni-

NEWEST SPORT FROCKS FOR SUMMER

At the left is one of the smartest sport models, made of tan and brown wool kasha, the overblouse being brown with trimmings of tan at the neck, sleeve and pockets. The pleated skirt is brown. In the centre is a clever sweater and skirt combination. The black and white Roshanara crepe is crossed with stripes of scarlet crepe. At the right is a suit of the finest tan kasha. The knife pleated skirt has a tan overblouse. From the throat hangs a large soft bow of white crepe. The jacket is of tan kasha with all-over embroidery done in white.

To A Scandal-Monger. The story that you spread Was all too true; The Wasplish things you said Were just her due.

But did you play the game? And was there need To blazon forth the shame Of her misdeed?

We might have saved her soul, Had yours been higher, Had you not claimed the role Of public crier.

Had you but reined your tongue About the wrong, We might today have sung A triumph song.

But through your dastard work She now has passed Into the deeper murk That chokes at last.

The love by which at first We spanned the breach Was wrecked by your accursed Evenomous speech.

God pity you when you Hereafter find He asks, not Was it true? But Was it kind? —Kennedy Williamson, in "The British Weekly."

THE MASKERS. The great gods in their merriment, Made man a naked thing, For all the winds of discontent, And thorns of love to sting. They made him as a chord to thrill, Vibrant to joy or pain; They made him as a reed, whose will, Is bent by any rain. They made him as a glass revealed For every mood to dim, Then gave him laughter as a shield Between the world and him. And gave him robe of words to hide The naked soul, afraid, And cloak of jests, that none beside, Might know the man they made. So hidden midst our kind we press, That scarce the great gods know Who wears the mask of happiness Upon the face of woe.
