THAT YEAR OF FREEDOM

BY MILDRED BARBOUR

THE DANGER SIGN.
Nan began her sittings for the portrait Danforth was determined to paint of her, the following week.

He wanted to do her in a black satin evening gown, décolleté and sleeveless, against a warm golden background, shot with rose.

"With your dusky hair, you will look like Cynthia, the Goddess of Night, rising against the sunset," he told her.

Louis Brandon came in the first afternoon to see what was being done. He was a striking contrast to Danforth. Immaculate in white flannel trousers and sport shoes, with his silk shirt open over his handsome, bronzed throat, a long, amber cigarette holder between his carefully manicured fingers, and smoke curling upward to his lazy eyes, he leaned gracefully against the wall behind the painter and surveyed Nan appreciatively.

"That's a peach of a gown, Miss Farraday. It makes you look stately and—or—unapproachable. I'm wondering where my little music student's gone."

She smiled constrainedly after the manner of a model in her first pose. "I'm afraid I'm going to get awfully tired sitting still so long. Will you ask Mr. Danforth to have pity on me?"

She thought humorously to herself that with his squat, square body, horn rimmed glasses, and big, pudgy hands, he looked far more like a conscientious window dresser than a successful artist.

"I'm afraid I'm going to get awfully tired sitting still so long. Will you ask Mr. Danforth to have pity on me?"

"I'm afraid I'm going to get awfully tired sitting still so long. Will you ask Mr. Danforth to have pity on me?"

As he drew forward the chair on the model stand and gave a last touch to the brocade background he had arranged in deft folds.

"I loathe being touched," she said crisply. "Really? What an unusual girl." His eyebrows went up humorously above his dazzling eyes.

"Louis, for the love of Pete, get out and let me go on with my work," begged Danforth peevishly. "How do you expect me to paint a portrait with you draped in front of the model. You're no transparent slyph, you know."

Brandon laughed good naturedly, made them both his graceful, ironical bow.

"It only requires two urgent invitations to depart for me to discover that I am apparently de trop. Ah, well, I go, but let me warn you, Miss Farraday, that Danforth's sending me away because he is jealous. He feels that he has so little chance with you when I'm around—you give all your attention to me."

He made a humorous, little grimace and closed the door behind him only to reopen it the next moment to say: "If you need me, Miss Farraday, you have only to call and I will hear you in my studio. I understand that any girl is quite safe with our estimable I anny, but you never can tell—especially about anyone as ravishing as you."
