THE DENOUNCEMENT

At Nan's incredulous cry: "Whatever do you mean?" the man who called himself Seeley, looked at her more closely. She felt as if his eyes were boring through to her brain.

She noticed also that he was carefully taking in every detail of her appearance-smart, little evening frock, her hair, the jewels on her slim fingers. But most of all, he studied her ple as A B C" eyes and she looked back at him squarely.

"How long have you known this Russian woman?" he demanded, without answering her question. Nan told him.

"How'd you come to meet her?" Nan explained about Louis Brandan's studio, and added:

"Really, Mr. Seeley, I can't under- ver crook." stand your right to cross-question me in this manner. Remember, you haven't | venient divan. stated who you are or why you are

"That's so," he agreed blandly, "but I wanted to find out what you'd spill if I took you unaware. Personally I don't believe you've got a thing to do three months arrears in rent, and this with this Russian woman's activities. But you never can tell. Maybe she used you because you look innocent and weeks and weeks." honest; maybe, on the other hand, you're clever enough to fake it." cheeks. Her eyes blazed.

"You are insulting, Mr. Seeley. Please state your business at once-or "Not so fast," he said soothingly, but there was an undercurrent of iron in the smooth words. "My business is just this: I've been sent here by the Russian interests in this country to investigate this woman who calls herself ly I can't be expected to make that Polinska." "You-you are a detective?" falter-

"Well," he said with a slight smile, "not the flat-footed sleuthy work is like this Polinska woman." forgetting her resentment against Madame Polinska now that she was so abruptly attacked, "what proof have you that she is a crook?" He answered deliberately:

take has been raking in hand over fist from those rich acciety swells are missing from the bank, every darn penny of them, and the lady is missing from her home since morning."

A great light broke over Nan. "And my car is missing from the garage," she added softly, wonder-

The man shrugged. "Figure it out for yourself, it's sim-

"How I was deceived," Nan murmured, amazed at her own credulity.

The man watched her narrowly. "I'm beginning to believe you were. At first I thought you were a confederate she left behind to delay us and maybe throw us off the scent, but now I really think you are just a nice girl who has been made a fool of by a cle-

Nan sank down nerveless on a con-

"But she has ruined me," she said in a horrified voice. "She has left me with all her bills to pay and they are terrific. This afternoon the owner of this house was here and demanded morning one of the servants told me that none of the staff had been paid for

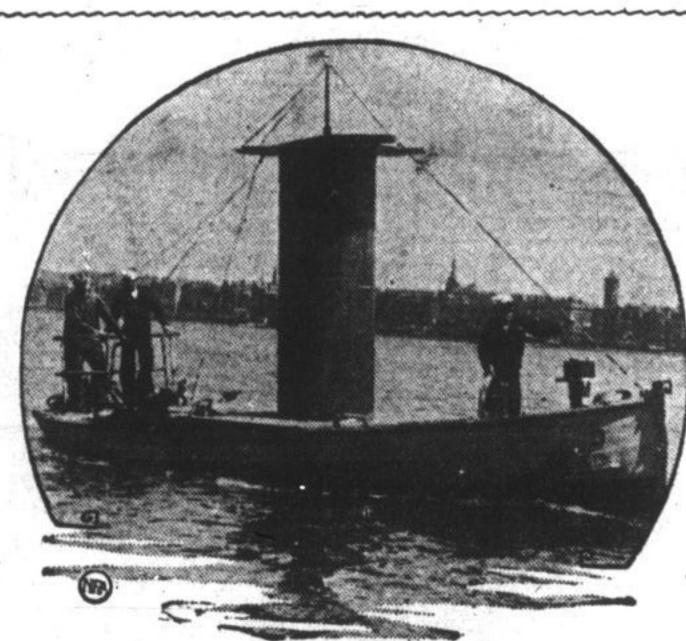

"Tough luck," he said as he laid a heavy hand a moment on her should-Swift, angry color swept into Nan's er. "I'm sorry for you. You seem a nice little thing, but you certainly are caught in a jam. This Russian woman took good care to introduce you everywhere, I understand, so you can't very well crawl out of your association with her. I guess you will have to pay up, Miss Farraday."

"But the fund for the starving children?" Nan lifted terrified eyes, "sure-

"Certainly not." he shrugged, "but I am afraid you will come in for a lot of unpleasant comment because you used to help her collect it, remember. Of concerned with international crooks, course, if we catch the woman, we'll force her to square you up nicely, but "But," Nan protested indignantly, she got a mighty good start on us in that car of yours. No one knows what direction she took. I guess she scented what was in the wind, alright, because she sure jumped quick."

When he had gone, Nan went up to "She's collecting money for a cer- her room and cried for the first time tain charity that is supposed to feed since she had begun her year of freethe starving Russians, isn't she?
