THAT YEAR OF FREEDOM

BY MILDRED BARBOUR

DUPED-AGAIN
Nan watched Danforth cover the portrait of herself and thought: "He takes as much care of it as if it were some fragile flower." As she was about to leave, Danforth said: "You won't mind letting me keep the picture for awhile for exhibition, will you, Miss Farraday? I will have it delivered at your home as soon as certain critics have viewed it." Nan was amazed. "Delivered at my home?" she echoed. "Surely you are not going to give the portrait to me?" He smiled slightly. "I told you before that I have priced it at $3,000." "But who will ever give that for it?" Nan answered with a laugh. "It's a masterpiece as far as you work is concerned, but I'm afraid that in me you chose a wholly uninteresting subject." He stared at her intently through his heavy-lenses. "But you are the one who pays $3,000 for it, Miss Farraday. I painted it on order." "Whatever did you say?" stammered Nan, her eyes wide with amazement. He answered deliberately. "I accepted your order to paint your portrait, did I not? Well, it is finished. It is satisfactory. I am waiting for my cheque." For a moment Nan could not believe her ears. But Danforth's face wore no smile to indicate that this was a jest, and his eyes, behind their horn rimmed glasses were hard. There was no beam, no shy admiration in them now. They looked like the eyes of a business man.

His reply was grimly significant. "A written order is not necessary in a matter of art. If you refuse to settle your debt pleasantly, I will have recourse to the courts." The threat made Nan wilt. She felt that she had undergone too much publicity in the recent Polinska affair to draw attention to herself further by being haled into court for payment of a debt. There were already too many creditors hounding her as a result of Madame Polinska's financial excesses. Though it hurt her pride to appeal to this man whom she was beginning to loathe, she said, with a little despairing gesture: "What good would going to court do, Mr. Danforth? I will tell you the truth—I can't pay for the portrait. I haven't sufficient money and all the courts in the world couldn't make me find enough." An angry flush mounted to his heavy forehead. "You mean to tell me that you deliberately ordered a portrait from me—the best and most expensive portrait artist in America—knowing all the time that you couldn't pay? It's preposterous! It's—it's criminal!" "You know very well that you are not telling the truth, Mr. Danforth," Nan broke in calmly. "You know that you saw a chance to trick me and you took it. But that's neither here nor there. The point is: I have no money to pay for the picture. Now, what can we do about it?" He began to pace the studio floor impatiently, his hands linked behind his back, his heavy chin thrust forward pugnaciously. "I'll have to think. I'll have to consult my lawyer. I'll have—Oh go away!" He wheeled on her suddenly. "Let me think this out alone. It's preposterous that I could have been so tricked by a client. It never happened to me before." Nan, with a glance of scathing scorn flung back at him over her shoulder, went in to see Louis Brandon. (To be continued)
