

Sheets soak themselves snowy white in Rinso

One of the hardest tasks on washday used to be the washing of big, heavy sheets. You had to rub and rub away at the sheets and afterwards you were so tired that the rest of the day was spoilt for you.

Today, no more of that back-breaking labour is necessary. Just let the Rinso soap-suds do this work for you! It soaks dirt right out. Rinso dissolves instantly and completely in boiling water.

Always use sufficient Rinso to get a lasing suds after the clothes are put to soak.

THAT YEAR OF FREEDOM

BY MILDRED BARBOUR

THE GOLD-DIGGERS WORLD

Looking back of the affair afterward, Larrabee hardly knew how he happened to drift into his friendship with Flora Hartley. But drift he did, and, before long, he was seeing the willowy, wistful eyed, clinging, little creature almost every evening.

Wary as he was after Caroline Prescott's pursuit, he still failed to note that it was Flora who deftly engineered their increasing intimacy, not himself. Unlike Caroline, Flora had no use for straightforward, strenuous measures. She pinned her faith to the old belief that strong men like helpless, appealing, kitten-like women, who gaze at them adoringly and show by every word and gesture their complete dependence upon their society. She had never failed yet when she put the theory into practice and, after a few weeks, she congratulated herself upon the fact that Dane Larrabee was her most shining example of the complete success of the system.

As for Larrabee himself, he made little attempt to analyze the impulse that kept him frequently in Flora's company. She possessed not one quality that was essential to his ideal woman. In every way except her extreme femininity, she was in direct contrast to Nan. But he was lonely and it was good once again to have a pretty woman across a table when he dined, encouraging him to talk, murmuring her admiration of his accomplishments. It was pleasant to attend the theatre, or go to supper at some gay cabaret afterward, with a pretty companion, although his fastidious taste rather revolted at her choice of gowns.

But there was still another reason which urged Larrabee to an acquaintance and an intimacy that was against his better judgment and his every sense of taste.

It had its inception the night of Phil Tanner's party—the night he had met Flora, when the girl called Vi, had left off dancing with him and told him to take a drink and wake up. His subsequent meeting with the same young woman and others like her, when he was accompanying Flora to this party and that, had deepened the consciousness in his heart that he was not only no longer a man in the full tide of his youth, and that years of business and recently a happy, contented, married life, had diminished the qualities that make a man attractive to women.

That is the deathblow of masculine vanity!

He wondered if Nan saw him that way too; if he were no longer a romantic lover to her, if that were really the secret of her becoming weary of him and going out into the world to see adventure among younger, fresher men.

It was a disturbing thought to Larrabee. His normal vanity, until then rather dormant, came actively and painfully to life. With a big virile man's breadth of vision, he had always scorned the so-called "fadies man." Now he would have asked nothing better than to be so characterized. It was a dangerous time for him to discover this impulse!

The immediate effect of his discovery was his deliberate cultivation of Flora and her kind of people—young people, gay people, ultra-modern and rather careless people. He wanted to emulate them, to play as they played, to be up to date and full of pep as they were. Most of all, he wanted to discover the qualities in men that made the girls declare that "So-and-so was a shiek," that another one had "the most marvelous line—my dear, your pulse isn't countable when he's in the room," or "when he kisses you, believe me, you stay kissed."

Larrabee admitted shamefacedly to himself that he was a puerile and unworthy ambition, but nevertheless he stuck stubbornly to his determination, to learn about what was to him, a new world.

He had all his life classified women on a sweeping scale as either good, or bad. One married the good ones, one had an amusing time with the bad ones, but one didn't refer to them, or appear in public with them.

Now, through Flora and her set, he was meeting girls who were neither actually good or actually bad. Some slipped from their bizarrely conventional path occasionally, but the other girls rather scorned them for it.

"Do you suppose the boob fell in love with him and lost her senses?" was the comment Larrabee came to hear rather frequently in Flora's set, concerning some weaker sister who had failed to play the dangerous game in safety. Poor little butterfly crushed on the wheel! Sad little salamander who fell into the flame!

About the time that Nan, wiser and sadder after her experience with Madame Polinska and the artist Danforth, was securing a job to sing in Jim Daly's cabaret, Flora Hartley had succeeded in making a niche for herself in Larrabee's lonely life.
