Answer to Saturday's Crossword Puzzle.

know. It is unfortunate that my work has detained me often and Madge has gone places alone. At those times, I believe, Mr. Cartwright acted as her escort, but I think that was due to the arrangements of hostesses rather than to any special preference of theirs."

Again Alma Cartwright was silent. She saw clearly that he was completely unsuspecting. It made her task more difficult. It was striking at a trustful heart.

"Then, as I understand it, doctor, you are not aware of the fact that Mrs. Bannister and my husband frequently saw each other alone by appointment."

He lifted startled eyes and stared at her unbelievably. Then a little flush mounted to his cheeks and a flash of anger, quickly suppressed, showed in his eyes.

"Pardon me, Mrs. Cartwright, but I am afraid you are exaggerating a trivial episode. I recall that your husband came to tea at my house one afternoon when I was away but my wife told me about it. There was no suggestion of a clandestine call."

"You know of no other times," she asked gently.

"None," he declared. "There may have been other times of course. Perhaps they may have lunched or had tea elsewhere without my knowledge, but I can assure you Mr. Cartwright, that there was no harm meant. Madge is impulsive and young and reckless. She is fond of life and gaiety and, being innocent herself at heart, sometimes does foolish things without realizing the interpretation that others put upon them. I am afraid that I shall have to ask you to forgive her if her actions have offended or distressed you in any way."

"What a man! What a good man!" Alma thought to herself.

"How fine of him not to suggest to her that it was her husband who was to blame in allowing Madge to do the things which compromise her, or more than that, incited her to folly."

Aloud she said,

"It's too late, doctor. You and I have both been blind. You more than I, because I knew before and refused to act. Will you read this letter which I received from my husband today?"

Surprised and with a little apprehension beginning to dawn in his eyes, he took the letter she offered and went to the window.

Sitting quietly in her chair, she watched him as he read and saw him slowly crumple as though the heart and soul, the very life of him was being shriveled in a devastating flame.

HEARTS ADRIFT

BY MILDRED BARBOUR

THE SECOND VICTIM

When Bannister left the hospital that afternoon, he drove directly to the Cartwrights.

Alma Cartwright's telephone message had surprised him but it never occurred to him that her summons was not professional, even though he had never been her physician. The wording of her request puzzled him a trifle but no inkling of the real truth crossed his mind.

He was ushered into the drawing room, cool and dim in spite of the hot sunlight outside. Through the open French windows he had the vista of the secluded garden surrounded by its red brick, ivy covered walls. He saw the old fashioned flowers beside the flagged walk, nodding in the sunlight. In the swing under the shade trees he glimpsed at the Cartwright children.

When Alma Cartwright entered the room, he was startled at her appearance. Though he had seen her very few times in his life and he remembered her to be slender and extremely pale, he was unprepared for the drawn whiteness of her face. Her eyes seemed to be burning as if with fever. That she was quite evidently ill was his instant professional diagnosis.

But the hand she offered him was not hot with fever. The icy touch of her fingers fairly chilled him.

"Will you be seated, Doctor Bannister?"

She accepted the chair he drew forward but turned it slightly so that her back was to the light.

"It was good of you to come so quickly," she said quietly, "and you must forgive me for calling you in the midst of your busy day, but this is a critical situation which you and I have to deal with and I think it is best that no time be lost."

He waited, puzzled, for her to explain.

She was silent for a moment as if summoning all her strength to go on. Her head with its heavy coils of ash blond hair drooped forward, and her eyes were bent on her interlaced fingers that moved nervously, ceaselessly in her lap.

"I have a very difficult task before me, Doctor Bannister," she continued, "and I trust that you will make it as easy for me as possible. I had hoped that there were some things I need not explain, but your attitude shows me plainly that you are ignorant of the situation. I dare say you know, Doctor, that your wife and my husband have seen a great deal of each other this past spring and summer."

Bannister looked uncomfortable.

Was he up against the proposition of a jealous wife? he wondered.

"I know that Madge and Mr. Cartwright have attended a great many of the same functions," he answered. "We all move in the same set, you

The Parole System.

Woodstock Sentinel-Review.

The fact that a man who had been released from penitentiary on ticket of leave is now sought as a murderer, has naturally directed some attention to the parole system. It is quite clear that a mistake was made in the case of that man. Other mistakes have been made in the past, and some of them have also proven rather serious.

But the system itself is not to be condemned because in a few cases it has given bad results. The latest official report dealing with the matter of parole indicates that the percentage of success is steadily increasing. Last year 83 per cent. of those paroled kept all the conditions
