HEARTS ADRIFT

By Mildred Barbour.

"Oh, come on, be a sport!" Enid Atkins laughed, tossing aside her hat and gloves. "There is no kick to Jimmy's wine unless you drink a gallon, but he can mix a cocktail that will make your hair curl. Give her one of your specials, Jimmy, two or three and she will forget her name."

Atkins was already busy at the improvised bar on the piano. He poured the contents of various bottles recklessly into a silver shaker and agitated it violently, becoming red in the face with the force of his activity.

"Had a good time, Ethel?" Enid inquired carelessly of her friend. "Did Jimmy try to make love to you?"

The other girl puffed languidly at her cigarette. "He never even kissed me, stupid old thing! He could not think of a thing except the missing 'Linehouse Blues.' I was just about to leave from sheer ennui when you came in."

"Jimmy, Jimmy, how could you be so negligent? Enid admonished her husband laughingly.

His reply was the presentation, with a flourish of a tray full of filled glasses.

Lila accepted hers hesitantly but her host saw to it that she drank it.

"Look me in the eyes and say 'How,' he ordered. "Then take it at one gulp. That's the girl!"

The taste was bitter and unpleasant, but after a few minutes, she felt a pleasant sense of warmth and well being and a little reckless and happy.

"Let's call Bill," Enid suggested, "and ask him to come over. Bill is Jimmy's brother," she explained to Lila. "He is the best sport in the world and absolutely wild. He will adore you. He is married but his wife is away. That's the time to know a man if you want fun."

That night for the first in her life, Lila slipped quietly, but a bit unsteadily, into her own home and went to bed without kissing her grandmother goodnight.

CHANGES.

Patricia stood on the terrace of the Marquise de Marzel's villa with a letter from Lila in her hand.

It was hardly a letter—only a brief and bitter note telling of the breaking of her engagement with Willoughby Creighton.

"His family found out about Madge," Lila had written without further details or comment.

Patricia, knowing Lila, could read between the lines. She knew in what anguish the girl had penned the words that told of the ending of her romance, of the humiliation which had been inflicted upon her. The contrast of that letter with the last one she had received from Lila—that bubbling, happy one, telling of the rosy future in store for her—made Patricia's heart ache.

It was all so unfair, so unnecessary and so futile—this aftermath of Madge's folly!

On the white, sandy beach below her, silhouetted against the blue of the Mediterranean, Patricia could see Madge with Tony Patterson. Her slim, lovely figure was clad in white and a crimson sunshade was tilted impudently over one shoulder. The contrasting colors represented Madge. She was like them, snow and flame.

She was laughing up into Patterson's face, gay, lovely.

Patricia's eyes travelled unvoluntarily upward to the veranda of the villa where Cartwright sat, his foot propped on a chair. The malady which he refused to admit was gout, had attacked him again. He was forced to inactivity and he presented a rather pitiable figure. He was no longer the assured, confident man of the world, debonnaire very blasé, calmly sure that Fortune would always toss her favors in his lap. He had become irritable and crabbed. He missed his old associates. He resented the confinement that was forced upon him, not only by his illness, but by the questionable situation into which his affair with Madge had plunged him.

He saw Madge slipping from him. Both Patricia and Madame de Marzel saw it too. They knew, as Cartwright knew, that Madge was falling in love with Tony Patterson. Patricia believed that the change in Cartwright was due to this, but Madame de Marzel, with her wiser, older eyes, saw further. She knew that the full tide of Cartwright's passion had long since ebbed. He had reached the stage when he asked himself what it had all been about—why, for the sake of one woman whose charms had palled, he had deliberately given up home and family, country and decent position, why he had made an exile of himself, a skulking, hiding creature who dared not mingle with his own kind.

The little Marquise knew why he made no open protest when Madge spent hours in Patterson's company.

But Patricia, less experienced, found herself pitying Cartwright despite her resentment against him. With her young eyes, she saw him as old, unhappy and discarded. The romantic lover, the daring adventurer who had defied her with such assurance on the night before they had all sailed for Europe several years ago, had given place to an old, almost broken man-ill, disappointed without hope for the future of his children. Cartwright was bereft, an exile in a foreign country, not far removed from a fugitive from justice.

So Patricia pitied him and was as kind to him as the compromise she made with her own principles would permit. He reacted to it like a stray dog who received an unexpected kind word and a pat on the head. He had started out to hate Patricia, but he had learned to respect her and to be grateful for the cordiality she offered. (To be continued)
