

Mark Your Ballot With this Mark of Prosperity

The Super-Pen with 25-year Point

THE more skill that's used in making a pen, the easier to write smooth, clear hand writing. And $5 buys a Parker Duofold Jr. with a full-handed grip for a boy's or man's strong hand and $5 buys a Lady Duofold pen with a slender grip to fit a girl's slim fingers.

Both are just like the $7 Parker Duofold except for size.

Choose your size, choose your point—Extra Fine, Fine, Medium, Broad, Stub, or Oblong. And choose your color—the lacquered with smart black tips, or the plain black trimmed with gold.

HEARTS ADRIFT
By Mildred Barbour.

When Madge came up from the beach, clinging to Tony Patterson's arm, Patricia handed her Lila's letter without comment.

Madge read it and frowned. Her frown was becoming permanent of late. Her mirror told her that she, too, had changed since coming to Madame de Marzel's villa. The lines of petulance were becoming stamped on her face. There was a trace of a wrinkle between her slender, arched eyebrows and a shadow under either cheekbone. She roused it away delicately and took a little more care about her expression when she was talking to a man she wished to attract, like Patterson.

In her own heart she made no denial that she had fallen madly in love with Patterson and that Cartwright no longer existed for her.

She had determined that every wife, every charm she possessed and which had won men in the past, should not fail her now.

Patterson should ask her to marry him.

TIME TO LEAVE.

When she had read Lila's letter announcing her broken engagement and saying briefly: "His family has found out about Madge," Madge returned it to Patricia without comment.

With a shrug, she made her way through the garden twirling her crimson sunshade carelessly. She passed Cartwright on the veranda with a careless nod. He acknowledged it gloomily. They had reached the stage in their relationship when they frequently did not speak to each other for a day at a time. Each knew that the other stayed because there was nothing else to do. They could go neither forward nor back. They were caught in an impasse.

Patterson, left alone with Patricia, looked after Madge and then glanced inquiringly at the letter in Patricia's hand.

Since he knew everything, Patricia gave it to him.

"That's a pity," was his comment as he handed it back to her. "It's a shame to have that child's future ruined. She is only a child, isn't she?"

"At heart, yes, but I think all she has gone through has made a very fine woman of her. She struggled through a long period of darkness and found happiness for herself and forgiveness for those who had recklessly hurt her. I hope this last experience won't be too much for her."

Patterson was silent for a few minutes.

"You know, Miss Fleming, I have about decided to return to the States. My boat will be coming back soon and I have no legitimate excuse for remaining here. What do you say to my looking up Miss Demerest? Maybe I can contrive to meet Mrs. Cartwright and find out what the situation is there. Of course it's none of my business, but having no real personal interest of my own—except one—" he smiled at her but she failed to interpret the significance of his glance. "I'm just that much of a fool to mix into other people's troubles. Yes," he said musingly, his gaze travelling seaward, "I think it's time I was going."

Patricia was a little puzzled. Her inference was that he was thinking of Madge. Perhaps he was falling in love with her. And Patricia, remembering what Madame de Marzel had told her about his elegance to someone else, believed that he deemed it expedient to put the ocean between himself and the alluring woman who belonged to another man.

She was a little disturbed by the sense of desolation which the announcement of his departure caused her. He had been a pleasant companion, the only one, aside from Madame de Marzel, whom she had had during her long sojourn at the villa by the sea.

"We shall miss you," she confessed.

ed to him frankly, "but it will be very fine of you to do a little work in our behalf. You see, we have so little real news from home. No one has ever heard from Mrs. Cartwright. It is barely possible that Time has changed her. She may have decided to free her husband. Then he and Madge can marry."

Patterson's expression was a trifle grim. He knew—even if Patricia did not—how far the thought of marriage was from the minds of Madge and Cartwright. He was not a vain man but he was not deliriously in love with him—or believed herself to be, as he more gallantly put it. Day by day it was becoming more embarrassing to escape from her deliberate attempts at flirtation, to pretend not to see the ardor in her eyes, to pass without comment her slighting references to Cartwright, to avoid the solitude which gave her coquetry full play and which sooner or later would thrust her into his arms to meet the humiliation of rebuff.

Only that day she had said: "I'm so tired of it all. Life is going stale. There doesn't seem to be any use living any more. It's just a dull routine of rising in the morning, having one's tub and dressing, then breakfast and lunch and tea and dinner, and going to bed again at midnight. The same food! The same people! The same details day after day! Nothing exciting or thrilling ever happens. I wake up in the morning with nothing to look forward to and I go to bed at night remembering myself that another day is gone, another twenty-four hours have been taken from my youth. Oh, Tony, I want to go away! Wouldn't it be heavenly if we could take your yacht when it returns and sail on and on into a new world?"

Patterson knew then that it was time that he was leaving. For his heart had room for but one image—Patricia's.

"How can you prevent the leather from cracking, Madam?"

Use a good wax polish.

"What do I recommend?"

"Nugget" Shoe Polish. It softens and preserves the leather, giving it the same nutriment as the animal's body does when the skin is on its back."

Gordon Answers Woods

Peterboro, Oct. 27.—That "one of the first official acts of the wealthy Sir James Woods after acquiring an interest in the Richard Hall store here was to increase the working hours of the seales girls without increase in remuneration," was the statement made last night by Hon. G. N. Gordon in answering an open letter addressed to him.

W. H. Wood, Ameliasburg, died on Saturday, aged seventy-four years. He was born in the home in which he died. He was a United Church member, a Conservative and interested in community affairs. A widow, three sons and a daughter survive.

Mr. and Mrs. Foreman and family, Pakenham, moved to Araprior recently. Before going away the junior pupils presented the boys with ever-sharp pencils. The boys will be greatly missed among their school companions.

AGED RESIDENT DEAD.

Maynard, Oct. 27.—Another old resident of Maynard passed away at the home of her daughter, Mrs. William Palmer, in Mrs. Susan Smith, whose home was at Plum Hollow for forty years. Six years ago she came with her daughter to Maynard where they purchased the Fretwell homestead and had resided there since. Mrs. Smith was in her nine first-year and had been in her usual health (with the exception of an occasional poor spell) until Saturday, 17th inst., when she was taken ill and on Sunday morning passed peacefully away.
