L. Morgan in Ottawa Journal. The only other claimant in what is now Eastern Ontario was the city of Kingston which had already had a taste of the prominence and prosperity which accompanied the seat of government and was anxious to gain the honor permanently. The City Council, as that of Ottawa did, prepared an address for transmission to the Colonial Office and it went a step further by instructing Thomas Kirkpatrick and John R. Forsyth to proceed to Lonents, Dr. and Mrs. G. H. Cowan, don, as a deputation from the city, "there to press upon Her Majesty's Miss Evelyn Knight, of Toronto, Privy Council the claims of Kingthe Legislature of this colony." "I need scarcely say," Mayor George spent Christmas with her parents, Davidson advised the delegates, "that the council expects that you re- will on your arrival promptly and the council places full reliance in Gordon Miller, of Guelph, spent your judgment, that you will adopt seem expedient, to aid you in the Miss Marjorie Doller and Douglas attainment of the great object Doller of Toronto, spent the Christ- which, secured, will elevate Kingmas vacation with their parents, Mr. | ston to the first rank amongst Canadian cities."

The Kingston address quoted exhaustively from the utterances and writings of former Governors approving of the selection of Kingston as a capital at an earlier period and, in common with the Ottawa address mentioned the military advantages which accompanied the possession of a fortified harbor, as well as the city's freedom from serious outbreaks of disease. It also recited the disadvantage of the other cities claiming recognition, among them Ottawa, of which it spoke as follows:

"Whilst the remote City of Ottaws-the recent town of Bytownwould possibly admit of fortification, though at an enormous outlay. Kingston's defences are already built, and as the outlet of the Rideau Canal, the key to that military work and the only protected harbor where a fleet could lie, it must ever be the stronghold on the possession of which the fate of Ottawa must de Kingston Indignant. "Whilst for Ottawa it may perhaps be contended that its inferiority in size, in population and in comparative importance constitute claims as the location of a capital on the principle acknowledged in America that the Legislature should be removed from the influence of a large and wealthy community, even these claims, shared as they may be considered to be by every village in the country, fall valueless before the fact that the situation of Ottawa on the between the two provinces exposes it in a marked degree to the same unfavorable influences that exist in Montreal, whilst its actual location municipal management almost impossible and tends to unfit it forever for a capital city. On the other hand, Kingston, without possessing so large or influential a population as to create a danger of pressure on the Legislature is of sufficient size and consequence to render all the necessary accommodation that increased population and the wants of a capital would demand." The attention devoted to Ottawa by the advocates of Kingston indicates that they feared the former as a serious contender for the muchcoveted distinction. And such Ottawa proved to be, in spite of the very earnest representations made in favor of Kingston and cities, for in a letter dated "Downing Street, December 31st, 1857," Sir Edmund Head, was officially notified that "in the judgment of Her Majesty, the City of Ottawa combines more advantages than any other place in Canada for the permanent scat of the future Government of the province, and is se-Purely upon its merits, Ottawa had won the great fight and although ment and the suggestion was made stone of the Parliament Buildings
