HOW PLANTS HARNESS THE SUN'S RAYS

Address Before the Royal Canadian Institute by Prof. Reed of Queen's.

Toronto Star Weekly.
The action of a living plant, absorbing its food from the light which is its principal source of sustenance in the only instance, short of falling water and the work of the winds, by which the sun's energy can be harnessed, said Prof. Gulliford B. Reed of the department of bacteriology and botany of Queen's University in his address before the Royal Canadian Institute Saturday evening on "Light and Life Processes."

Commencing by describing the mechanism with which plants absorb light to form food by photosynthesis, Prof. Reed proved the manner in which growing plants by exposure to the light, produce chlorophyll, or the substance which gives them their green texture. This chlorophyll is a combination of starches and sugar and sugar and its manufacture is carried on with the aid of only the sun's rays. The starches and sugars in turn produce the end product in the plant and aid the storage of energy.

On the basis of investigation made in the laboratories at Queen's University, it has been shown that the most efficient part of the light spectrum in that which is absorbed by the leaf chlorophyll. "Every part of the light spectrum, from infra red to ultra violet are concerned in this process," Prof. Reed said.

It has been effectively proven that there is no single relationship between the intensity of the light and the time of exposure in producing such plant energy. "If it would seem that plants which were exposed to most intense light by artificial means, need not necessarily increase their production of energy in a like ratio.

With ordinary methods of cultivation, it now requires between two and one-half to three acres of land to expose enough plant to the light to supply a single person with enough food for existence.

Prof. Reed looks to the day when further scientific improvements will decrease the acreage required to allow plant life sufficient light to enable them to store up the energy required to nourish them to maturity.

There is, however, an intrinsic limitation on such expansion of science owing to the fact that the photosynthetic action of energy production precludes the idea that improvement may be made to an indefinitely great extent.

EVANGELIST CHAPMAN SPEAKS.

At The New Church On Alfred Street Sunday Night.

"The course of human history for the past twenty-five hundred years has been exactly in accordance with the prophetic outline given in the 2nd chapter of Daniel in the days of Nebuchadnezzar. Mighty men have at times attempted to carry out plans which conflicted with this outline but none have succeeded. All the wisdom and shrewdness of Napoleon, all of his ingenuity and knowledge of military tactics, all the strength of his mighty army was not sufficient to break the power of a few simple words of Scripture," said Evangelist Chapman, at the new church on Alfred street Sunday night. His subject was: "The History of the World Foretold?"
