THE CARPENTER. Somehow, I never see Old hands made rude, and worn with heavy toll. Seamed and gnarled, unbecomingly rough. But there is touched a tender chord in me. Just so, I think, were they, St. Joseph's hands that never knew repose, Nor any graceful art; but patiently, Lifted and hewed the heavy board, all day. And still those rough hands led, With utmost gentleness, the little Christ. And He was happy when He felt them laid In loving benediction on His head.

HER OWN WAY

By a Girl of To-day. EXPLANATIONS. "Of course," said Mamie, "Sterns will keep me here just as long as he can tonight, Julie, for he knows that you are rooming at our department. I bet you'll hardly get out the door when he'll come here to pump me, but don't you worry, Julie, I'm enough for that man and he knows it. I've never come off second best when he's tried to bawl me out yet."

"You've said something," I answered. "Mamie Riley is the best friend I've had in all the world. I never dreamed a girl could be so sweet and sincere and honest. Why, Jimmie, when I see her smiling at all those satyrs who think that they are flattering her, I can only think of a lily in a muck bed. Yes, Mamie is my best friend."

"No, Judy, not your best friend, if you'll consent to count me in. No one on earth will be a better friend to you than I if you'll let me be so."

"My, but you're coming along fast, Jimmie. You know I hardly knew you in our old home town and now you want me to let you be my best friend."

Jimmie Costello looked so hurt that I hastened to assure him that I knew he was as good a friend as Mamie.

"But not any better. Remember that, young man," I said.

"Well, I'll try to be satisfied with that," he grinned. "But I'll warn you, young lady, I'll not take anything less than come time — he tucked me a little closer under his arm — "that I may ask you to let me be a little something more."

"Don't. Please don't, Jimmie, for I'd hate to lose as good a friend as you, if you are hinting that you want to be my sweetheart. I don't want a sweetheart and I do want a friend."

"Oh, don't worry about me," cheerfully remarked Jim. "What do you want to do, take a taxi or do you want to go into the first eating place we come to?"

"That's much better. I'd rather walk."

As we passed in front of a brilliantly lighted window, Jimmie Costello stopped short and twisted me around.

"Judy, how long have you been here?"

"About two months."

And have you had to stand the insolence of those men all that time?"

"No, I didn't have to all the time, but if I were not listening to their insolence, I would have been listening to their compliments which was worse. I've come to the conclusion that a man is inordinately proud of his supposed power to please for he's always trying to add to his little box of tricks."
