Of Rural England at Kirkpatrick's Art Gallery.

It is some time since Kingston had a good exhibition of water color drawings, so picture lovers will be all the more pleased at having an opportunity of viewing and, if they wish, buying, some of the exceedingly attractive pictures brought to Kingston by the artist, J. Geddard Walton, that are on view in the Kirkpatrick Art Gallery this week.

Mr. Walton is, he will tell you, a Canadian who has spent some time in England, and has, as you will see, been greatly attracted by the flower-surrounded English cottages of which he has many pictures, each one distinctive in its way.

Mr. Walton's work is satisfactory. He paints the thing as he sees it without striving after effect, but those who delight in futurist and cubist pictures and admire the efforts of that popular school may not care for the charming water color drawings of subjects that are in themselves delightful and are reproduced to make a restful and ornamental picture.

THE CLASH OF COLOR

A Study in the Problem of Race.

In March, 1924, the first edition of "The Clash of Color" by Basil Matthews was published and in November, 1925, the fourteenth edition was ready for sale. This in itself is a remarkable success for a book of non-fiction, but the appeal of the book and its far-reaching message is still more remarkable.

The inventions that have made the world one from a commercial and industrial standpoint have changed the face of things. In China, in Japan, in India, in Africa, men and women are making in factories, digging from the earth and growing in plantations articles we Canadians use in our daily life.

Basil Matthews feels that to solve the problem of "self-determination" for the nations in a way that will make the world one, there must be what he calls "team play" between them. He sees China as he picturesquely describes her as "a bowl whose millions are spilling over the Pacific's brim."

In the last chapter with a brilliance and eloquence that is thrilling, he takes his readers once more over the lands and shows them the dark-skinned peoples who have their places in God's great scheme of things worshipping the same God as their white brother, ready to play
