An Evolution.
One of the interesting things about this 50th anniversary year of the birth of the telephone is the story of the evolution of the telephone directory. In the early days, of course, telephone users called each other by simply announcing the name wanted to "Central." Primitive cards lists of users adorned the wall beside the telephone. Then as the number of telephone users grew, the list had to be made up in book form. Month by month and year by year the value of the telephone book for reference purposes increased. It was always found a reliable guide, and being frequently revised, its usefulness soon exceeded that of any other city reference. Today, everybody looks in the telephone directory. It is the community's most used and most useful book.
