KNEW HE HAD NO RIGHT TO PENSION

Judgment of Chief Justice Meredith in Waddell-Queen's Pension Action.

In his written judgment dismissing the action by the widow of the late Dr. John Waddell against Queen's University to establish a right to a pension of $1,000 a year during her life, or to recover $25,000 damages by reason of the refusal to recognize such right, Chief Justice Meredith says:
"Neither the defendant's principal officer nor any member of the board had any kind of power to put the defendant under any such obligation. It would be extraordinary if they had; or, if having it, it had been exercised, having regard to financial considerations, and that is enough to dispose of the contention based upon the suggestion that some of them did; but it would not be just to them to leave the matter there; and I cannot but feel, upon the whole evidence, that none of them ever so undertook or did or said anything that with any degree of reason could be taken as an indication of any kind of support of the claim made in this action."
"It is an old story that everyone should be just before being generous; and there are few universities in this country which could be just to their students if they were generous after the fashion contended for by the plaintiff."
"Although it is not necessary even to refer to it, it is satisfactory to have evidence in writing of the plaintiff's husband which make plain the conclusion to which all the rest of the evidence has led."

Terms of Resignation.
"In the resignation" in writing of the plaintiff's husband, he made certain demands, compliance with which he insisted upon if the defendant wished to retain his services. His communication was, as he knew all things respecting his employment should be, with the board of trustees. One of his demands thus made was that he should have a retiring allowance when he retired from the service. No claim for a pension for his widow or family was made or at any time suggested by him. The demands were made in a somewhat peremptory manner, and were, mainly, for that reason, no doubt, peremptorily rejected and his resignation at once accepted."
"He was subsequently re-employed and some time afterwards got some promotion and some increase in his salary; but there is not a tittle of evidence of his ever having afterwards demanded, requested, or suggested a pension for himself or for any of his family."
"In regard to the allegations of deceit on the part of some of plaintiff's husband's fellow officers in the defendant's service—that the concealed from him the fact that Carnegie Foundation had discontinued grants of pensions to those employed by the defendants—and that by reason of such deceit he continued in the defendant's service; without stopping to consider how that could affect the defendant, if at all, I can but find and say that I cannot see even a shadow of suspicion of any such misconduct on the part of anyone, in any of the evidence adduced upon this trial."
"In regard to the assertion that the defendant's officers did not do all they should have done in seeking a pension from the Carnegie Foundation for the plaintiff; no obligation in law rested upon them to do anything; and the fact is that they earnestly and perseveringly sought aid for the plaintiff."

Can't Enforce Charity.
With regard to Mr. Calder's plea that Dr. Waddell was qualified for a pension under the Carnegie Foundation, Chief Justice Meredith points out that those who alone had the right to say this had not found that he was so qualified. In any event, the court could not enforce charity, and if it could it would have to be against the Foundation which was not a party to the litigation.
His lordship further points out that there is no provision for bringing members of the staff over forty years of age within the Carnegie annuity scheme. He had paid nothing under that scheme and had no sort of contract.
"The assertion," says the judgment, "that he remained in the defendant's employment in the faith of being insured a pension is purely imaginary; there were no grounds for such a faith, and little, if any, of a hope, after his resignation and re-employment. And neither hope nor faith creates a contract. Imagination in which the plaintiff does not seem to have had enough faith to launch this action for two years and nine months."
With regard to Mr. Calder's contention that Dr. Waddell knew all about the annuity scheme, and that if it had not been for that knowledge he could have left Queen's and bettered himself elsewhere, Chief Justice Meredith remarks that the argument is a dangerous two-edged sword. If Dr. Waddell knew all about it he would have known that it made no provision for older men in which class he was, that even the younger men had to pay 5 per cent. for their benefits. The judge remarks that Dr. Waddell would have been unable to take advantage of the scheme as he found it difficult to make ends meet and was unable to make usual arrangements for life insurance.
"He may have had some hope," continues the judgment, "that some scheme might some time be devised and adopted that might be of some good to him; but it must have been a very forlorn hope."
"He lived in the knowledge that his only request regarding a pension was one for a pension for himself; and he lived and died in the knowledge that he had no right to any pension."

To Vote On The Site.
Following a decision to put a vote of the ratepayers the choice of a site for rebuilding the Renfrew hospital, a large delegation composed of the mayor, representatives of the county, hospital board, doctors and citizens left for Pembroke to request the Renfrew county council to make a grant towards the construction of the new building. What is called the Hennessy site in the north part of the town, is held to be more central than the former location, but both are to go on the ballot to allow the electors to make their wishes known.
