A New Aid to the Deaf. The newly discovered magnetic alloy called "permalloy" developed in the Bell Telephone Laboratories has just enabled Bell scientists to perfect a new receiver six-tenths of an ounce in weight. This comfortable device in combination with a transmitter and through the "wall of silence" around a person whose hearing is impaired. The apparatus, which is a by-product of research into the field of sound, comprises a microphone as large as a pile of six half-dollar pieces, an amplifier with two tiny vacuum tubes, and a minute ear receiver. The permalloy, the new nickel-iron alloy which is also now used to speed up ocean cable transmission, is very sensitive, and in the tiny receiver prevents acoustic shock. Using the new device, a person who has lost sixty per cent of his hearing can again follow the conversation in a room of average size.
