RINGWORMS IN SMALL PIMPLES
Turned to Blisters. Lost Sleep. Cuticura Heals.
"I had ringworms on different parts of my body. They first appeared in small pimples, then gradually got worse and began to blister. The ringworms were in circular form, several of them being as large as a fifty-cent piece. They caused continual irritation, also loss of sleep."
"A friend advised me to try Cuticura Soap and Ointment so I purchased some. They gave instant relief and in the course of a short time the ringworms were completely healed." (Signed) Miss Margaret Mitchell, R. R. 1, Shinners Bridge, N. S.
Cuticura Soap, Ointment and Talcum are ideal for daily toilet use.

The Vital Flame

A Stirring Serial of Primitive Passions

by May Christie

CHAPTER XII.
"I understand that perfectly," lied the clever little milliner. "If I knew you better, I could explain lots of things about you."
The bait was swallowed instantly. Lady Warrington, whatever her virtues, did not number reticence among them.
"Do, do tell me." She moved nearer the speaker, quite enthralled. "I haven't met anyone in ages who so interests me." (Which, in a way, was true, since it's human nature to find the topic of oneself absorbing!)
"I have an almost infallible instinct in these matters," quoth Leonie, enjoying her effect. "I sense things—"
Here a waiter approached, and Lady Warrington ordered two more liqueurs—a second for herself, and one for the fascinating "sestress."
"I sense things," proceeded the latter, solemnly. "For instance, the moment I meet a woman, I know if she has charm for men, or not. It forgives my frankness—it radiates from you! It's a power beyond good looks, equipped as you already are with these. It's something indefinable, and yet—as Barrie says so aptly—if a woman has this charm, she has every feminine weapon rolled in one, and needs nothing else. I am sure—here Leonie lowered her voice confidentially—"I am sure that your life has been full of men. Dear lady, you simply couldn't help it. It isn't in your power to drive them off. It never will be. You are one of those people—fortunate or unfortunate—who are fated to attract the opposite sex—the have suitors, one after another—" She broke off.

"Good gracious! I sound exactly like a cheap fortune-teller! I ought to have a red scarf round my head and big gilt earrings! she told herself. "She'll never fall for this old stuff!"
"Oh, do go on," breathed Lady Warrington. This news was meat and drink to her—nay! nectar and ambrosia. "I—please don't think me vain!—but I do have a queer sort of fascination for some people."
Leonie nodded sagely.
"I know it. And you'll never grow old, either." This was a master stroke. "You'll always have that young, vital air you have just now. Your type can never age."
("The poor, deluded dear is just ready to fall on my neck and kiss me!" thought the arch-flatterer, in triumph.)
"My family do keep their youth—" ful looks. They're noted for it," stammered the delighted hearer.

"Ah, it's nothing to do with that. It's you, yourself. It's your avidity for life, your young enthusiasms, and—above all—the curious—power some women have—(you're one of them)—of attracting love and homage wherever you go. This universal admiration does keep a woman girlish."
"I've just come back from a visit to the United States, and over there the men were simply wonderful to me" coyly announced the charmer.
"They lunched me and dined me, and motored me everywhere, and said such—such sweet and gracious things—"
("They would!" thought her companion grimly. "From all I've heard, it takes an American man to do the heroic stunt, and make a plain woman feel that just to be a woman is a triumph! I'll take my hat off to them, every time. More, one day I'll go there myself, and try them out.")
Her companion produced a card-case, and offered her a bit of paste-board, whereon her name was printed.
"Lady Warrington!" read Leonie aloud, in tones made up of just the right proportion of astonishment, delight, and awe. "This is a pleasant surprise for me. I've heard of you so frequently from dear personal friends of mine."
And here the bold young creature named the wealthiest of her customers, and those most socially prominent, whose names would at least be familiar to her vis-a-vis.
Not knowing in what circumstances Miss Leonie had met them, Lady Warrington was agreeably flattered once again.

"I'm sorry I haven't a card of my own with me," apologized the former. (It wouldn't do to produce a business card—not yet.) "But I am Leonie Day—one of the Hampshire Days, you know," she added, as an afterthought.
Lady Warrington gave a little squeal and held her hand out cordially.
"My late husband was a great friend of dear, handsome Sir Marmaduke Day, who was killed some years ago in a hunting accident," she gurgled.
"Ah, yes! A cousin of mine! Sad affair!" remarked the little hat-shop lady, nonchalantly. Then, with a quick twist of conversation, so that quicksnaps might be dodged:
"We were talking of your hats."

"I was to see them, wasn't I?" Lady Warrington rose immediately.
Together they went up to her room, which was strewn with boxes of all shapes and sizes.
Leonie's trained fingers twisted the smart models into new and more becoming angles for her new acquaintance. Alas! she couldn't bring about a similar miracle with the colours, which were much too glaring to frame the sallow countenance of the wearer.
"I choose the blue to match the color of my eyes," came the compliment comment. "And a touch of pink—as in that rose—brings out the rose tints in my cheeks. Don't you think so?"
Frankly, Leonie did not.
She achieved wonders, all the same, first of all dressing Lady Warrington's untidy locks in more becoming style, and then affixing each hat at its correct angle.
"You are a genius," breathed the older woman. "You have transformed me, dear! Maids never stay with me, I'm so untidy and erratic. But I really need one. My friend, Mr. Warwick Treman, did say he'd found a capable Swiss woman who understood hair-dressing and so on, but I've heard no more about her."
"Mr. Treman is also a friend of mine," said Leonie, glad they had one mutual acquaintance. "Perhaps I could find a suitable girl for you."

goss over it. The sixth line said, "This ticket will take the owner to any place in Drowsy Land."
"Well, what of it," said Nick. "What has that got to do with you stretching out so long I can't hold you in my two hands."
"Lots," said the ticket. "Let me go, and then see what happens. I can't take you any place, can I, if you're going to hold onto me so tight. Where should you like to go?"
"Just any place at all," said Nick thoughtlessly, never dreaming what his words meant.
"That's three stations off," said the pink ticket. "Lay me down on the ground and see what happens."
So Nick let go to ticket, and instantly it spread itself along the ground in a straight line and turned into a railroad track. And Nancy and Nick found themselves in a neat little car, rolling smoothly along on two long black lines that had turned into tracks.
"I see now why they say that tickets take you places," said Nancy. "Isn't this fine!"
Soon Shut-Eye Town was far behind with all its queer people. And the Twins forgot to wonder about the foolish things they had seen. They kept looking to the right and left this way and that for some sign of Inco and Flops. They passed an orchard where dreams were growing and a snore factory, and a yawning cave. And they also passed a sandy hill marked, "Private! Keep off! Sandman."
"I suppose," said Nancy, "that is sleepy sand."
"It is," said the ticket. "But here we are. This is your station. It is called Any Place At All! Hop out!"
With that it curled itself up and jumped into Nick's pocket.
