Judicial Humor

On many a British jurist's brow there perches the halo of genuine humor. Thus girl are Viscount Haldane and Baron Darling. Both are members of Britain's highest court, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Both grew up together, when the committee considered an appeal by the Canadian Ministry of Finance against a decision of the Supreme Court of Canada respecting one Cecil Smith, confessed bootlegger of Windsor, Ont. Succinctly put, the question at issue was: "Ought the Crown to reap taxes from incomes known to be drawn from illegal sources, or is the $90,000 annual income of Cecil Smith not taxable because he is a bootlegger?"

Without impaling themselves on either horn of this dilemma, Lords Haldane and Darling became reminiscent. Viscount Haldane: "Once, when a burglar in the Exchequer Court asked for an accounting against his partner, the Court clapped both into prison. A man cannot invoke his own wrong-doing against the law."
Barrister Brit (counsel for Bootlegger Smith): "But suppose a man should set himself up as a professional murderer of Cabinet Ministers. . . . Would not the Crown refuse to receive taxes from the murderer's source of income, lucrative though it might be?"

A. C. Clouston (for the Crown): "One has only to look into a man's pockets, and if there are profits there, that is enough for the tax-gatherer. I do not say that if the pockets be full of stolen spoons one spoon should be taken as a tax on burglary. There is a valid distinction between profits and loot."
Baron Darling: "After all the bootlegger is only a smuggler, and in the eighteenth century everybody traded with smugglers. . . . Now if a man were a pirate the law should say, 'although you are a pirate I will tax you, and because you are a pirate I will hang you.'
"The state, I may remark, has taken the estates of numerous hanged criminals; but it calls that going into partnership with felons."
"recall, however, that once when a highwayman took a case into one of the courts the presiding judge suffered a fit from which he never recovered."
