The Vital Flame A Stirring Serial of Primitive Passions by May Christie

CHAPTER XLIV. Leonie and Lady Warrington sat with their host in a sort of little bower beside a trickling, water-fall, under exquisitely-shaded lights that made even the plain pretty, and the pretty, beautiful. Bald-headed Romeos cavorted gaily with bewitching maidens. Lovers swooned across the tiny tables towards each other. An intriguing melody crooned from the highest-priced orchestra in the world. "Is that the saxophone?" she asked, as from one of the instruments came a long-drawn, whining note, plaintive and fascinating. He pointed out various Napoleons of finance to her, and names well known on Wall Street. "I didn't think they'd find time to relax like this," commented the English girl. "They don't look as though they had a care in the world."

empty, its fickleness, its tawdry gaiety. There must be some way out that was honourable and fair! He must be absolutely honest with the girl and tell her that he did not love her as a man should love his future wife. Perhaps she did not really care for him as much as she imagined? On boardship she had been pleased to accept the attentions of other men. A gleam of hope shone there. A small crowd stood on the pavement outside a music-shop. A large megaphone or trumpet was set near through the centre of the window-pane, magnifying the shrill notes of a woman's voice who—seated at a piano in the interior of the place—was justly bawling the very latest song-hit. Miles halted for a moment in the doorway. "God! What a life for a woman!" he thought, glancing with pitying interest at the peroxide blonde whose livelihood was earned in such a curious way. At the conclusion of the song she rose, and flung an alluring smile through the window at the pavement crowd. They gaped at her in semi-boredom. No one made a move to buy a copy of the piece she'd sung. "I'll take half a dozen copies," said Miles with quick generosity, stepping forward on an impulse. If she couldn't sell the music, then she would lose her job, he knew. The owner of the shop would hire a younger, more attractive woman, in the true Broadway manner. "Thanks. I'm a bit up against it." She rolled the sheets together. Then, with an apathetic glance at him, a sudden gleam of recognition came to her tired blue eyes, and she added quickly: "Guess we've met before?" (To be continued)

He still loved her, despite all attempts to hate her and cast her from his life. Marcella! Image of all that was desirable, but at heart so mercenary and so deceiving! He had been fooled! His eyes were open now, wide open. Marcella had fallen to the highest bidder, with all the worldly wisdom and calculation of her sex. But—try as he would—he could not tear her image from his mind or heart. With feet of clay, his idol had toppled from the pedestal; yet there were times when it seemed to him that she was nearer, dearer, than she had ever been before! Marriage with Leonie Day was like a great cloud on the horizon. He cursed himself for the entangled being, being too innately fine and chivalrous to see Miss Leonie's own

Barr left for their home in Saskatchewan on Monday. Mrs. F. Thompson and children, Havebeck, at W. Brown's. Mr. and Mrs. W. Hill have returned home. Mr. and Mrs. F. Price, Brockville, were at J. ADVENTURES OF THE TWINS Olive Roberts Bartor

A Trip to Spain. "Tira-Lira-Loo!" called Johnny Jump Up. "Wake up, Nancy and Nick." "I'm awake!" answered Nick quickly. "So am I," said Nancy. "Are we going away, Johnny?" "We're going to Spain," said the little garden fairy. "Timmy Titmouse is all ready and waiting." Soon both of them were dressed and Johnny Jump Up gave them the magic shoes which they put on. They began to shrink up until you could have put two of them into a mustard pot. Then out of the window and down the vine they crept, and there they were in the garden. "I hope you will have a nice time," called the fairy from the red rose. "Don't you hope I'll have a nice time, too?" inquired Tommy Titmouse. "Are there any bugs and worms in Spain?" "The little Spanish lady laughed. "Yes, of course, there are, Tommy. As big as alligators." "Hugh! What's that?" cried the little bird. "Then you can just go there without me. Maybe the bugs in Spain eat the birds instead of the birds eating the bugs." "Oh, come on, Tommy," said Johnny Jump Up. "Now who is doing too much talking? Here, punch these tickets and we'll be going." "Are the bugs as big as alligators, honest?" asked Tommy nervously. "No, I was only fooling," laughed the little rose fairy merrily. "Go on! You'll have a good time." Like many other countries they had visited, it was daylight in Spain although it was night at home.
