MISCELLANY. The following is a description of the MINES Professor SILLIMAN visited in Derbyshire, England.

THE Owlin Mine is believed to have been wrought by the Romans and Saxons. However this may be, the enormous mass of rubbish collected near its mouth, demonstrates that it has been worked for a very long period. It is situated near the foot of Mam Tor.

The first thing that attracted my attention on entering the small huts around the mine, was the beating of the ore. This is performed by women; they break it to pieces with a kind of mallet; it is then sifted, washed, and sent away to be melted.

My guide conducted me into his wardrobe where I put on a miner's dress. It consisted of an old tow-cloth pair of breeches, coarse and dirty; a woolen short jacket in the same condition, and an old hat, with the brim all cut off, except three or four inches, and that turned behind.

With a lighted candle stuck into a piece of clay, I now followed my guide into these dark, damp and solitary regions. He carried a lighted candle in his hand, and two more were suspended from his neck. The mine opens into the side of the mountain, between two walls of lime stone; the entrance is about two feet wide and five feet high. Of course we went in, sloping, and with very little room to spare on either side. In this manner we proceeded through a passage always narrow, and varying in breadth according to the breadth of the vein. The descent was gradual, and the bottom of the passage being every where deep, with mud and water, was rendered somewhat more practicable by boards and timber, which were, however, generally buried in the mire.

We went forward sloping; sometimes almost creeping, and often through passages so narrow that it was necessary to go sideways. Over our heads was a flooring of boards laid on wooden rafters, to support the roof of the mine, and from this the water was every where dripping and trickling down the walls, so that we were kept continually wet.

Our path frequently descended to the depth of 40 or 50 feet, like a staircase, and the gallery, similar to that of the mine, was 40 or 50 feet, like a staircase, and the mine runs off. Some care was of course necessary, in passing by these shafts, that we should step into them; but they are generally in some measure covered with boards. In this manner we travelled on half a mile into the bowels of the mountain.

When we had reached the end of our journey, we ascended into a great cavern, which they had excavated to the distance of 40 feet above our heads. The ascent was by means of timbers fixed in the crevices of the rock, like the rounds of a ladder. Here I took hold of the pick axe, and broke off some of the lead ore to bring away as specimens.

We returned a part of the way, and then took an excursion into another vein which diverged from the principal one at an acute angle; this vein has been explored for a mile, but we contented ourselves with going only half this distance.

In our progress through the mine I had the satisfaction of seeing, in their native situations, the most important ores of lead; the beautiful crystallizations of flour spar, and calcareous spar; the fulphat of barytes, native copperas, and extensive strata of lime stone, filled with the most curious petrifications. The scene was to me extremely interesting and instructive, and two hours passed rapidly away in the mine. The ore is conveyed to day light by means of small waggons. The nature of the situation necessarily precludes the employment of any domestic animal, and the miners therefore act in their stead; they are literally harrowed to the waggons, with collars and traces, and thus travel back and forward through these dismal regions. They are obliged to go at least half a mile with every load, and all the way through darkness, and very often their load is nothing but rubbish, for, it is indispensable that this be constantly removed, otherwise the gallery would be so obstructed that no work could be done. Yet they usually spend their whole lives here, and seem a very cheerful set of men. My guide has been 25 years in the mine, and his father and grandfather had consumed all their days in the same place.

We now returned to the light, bringing with us specimens of the different
