MISCELLANY.

FOR THE KINGSTON GAZETTE.

RECKONER—No. 41.

THIS days entertainment is contributed by a friend who sometimes smiles on the labors of the Reckoner.

Among superficial people it is very common to consider old age not merely an evil, but even a reproach, and tho' it cannot be averted, a thousand artifices are employed to conceal its presence or retard its approach. To smooth a wrinkle or to hide a grey hair is supposed a matter of greater importance than to disguise a vice or to reform a bad habit. This with the fair sex is a most serious labor; they behold the marks of age with the greatest horror, and are peculiarly solicitous to counteract its operations. And so far have they contrived to get the general opinion in their favor, that to hint to a lady that she is growing old is an offence of the deepest dye, & for which the guilty wight can expect no forgiveness. A gentleman of my acquaintance who had not mixed much with the world was once introduced to a lady of a very advanced age, but nevertheless of great vivacity and wit. It happened that they were left for some minutes in the parlor together, and the poor man after considering with himself what to say, the weather, &c. having been already discussed, and becoming ashamed at the protracted silence, at length said, "Madam, I perceive that you are very old." The lady replied, "Sir, I perceive that you are a very young man." This answer discomfited my poor friend, who durst not address her a second time.—This horror at old age would be the more excusable, as well as the solicitude to conceal its effects, were this period of life totally destitute of its peculiar advantages which place it at least on a level with any former portion, advantages which if properly appreciated, are not inferior to those which accompany the ardor and bloom of youth.—It is true those who have no relish, but for personal attractions and frivolous accomplishments have great reason to wish that time may stand still, and may be allowed to turn with horror from that unwelcome view when the hollow cheek and glimmering eye take the place of the rose and the lightning glance, and when the anxiety to appear young from the use of fashionable drels becomes ridiculous and contemptible. To such persons age brings no advantages, and to such we do not offer any consolation for the loss of youth and beauty. But when the mind has been properly cultivated, and the conduct directed by morality and true religion, age is so far from being an object of dread, that it is beheld with delight. We are pleased with the transient bloom of Spring, and the growth of Summer, chiefly because these two seasons lead to the maturity of the fruits of Autumn.—The means are always valuable, but not so much so as the end proposed. We have lived to little purpose if the experience we have acquired do not make us more useful members of society, and if to this we can add the consciousness of a well-spent life, we must be happy.—Hilaris has long since passed the meridian, yet he is cheerful and content, beloved by his family and friends and respected by the public; he appears much more happy than during any former period of his life. Tho' not distinguished by any superiority of talents, he was in his early years careful to cultivate his mind and to discharge his duty with diligence and fidelity. The reward is now his, for his friends and neighbors look up to him with a deference & respect which, joined to internal peace, afford him pleasures every moment not to be equalled by the most brilliant enjoyments of youth.

Melissa was followed in her teens by the fashionable and the gay, and tho' not indifferent to the lighter accomplishments, which set off youth and beauty to advantage, she had acquired from her mother a taste for select, not promiscuous reading. This habit gradually improved her understanding, and consequently discovered the folly of the amusements so eagerly sought after by her friends and companions. She discovered in their eagerness a greater anxiety to avoid pain than to reap enjoyment. It was not because they were really happy in tasting these enjoyments, but because they were miserable if left alone, and she verified by her own experience the maxim of a Philosopher, that they who cannot spend occasionally a day alone with cheerfulness, never can be happy.

Melissa having acquired a large stock of common sense, and some general information
