RECKONER—No. 66.

At te pana manet, ni desinis esse niperba.

Mariana was the daughter of the Colonel of a Provincial regiment who had distinguished himself for his loyalty in the American war. She arrived in Montreal just turned of twenty, full of health and spirits, and possessing more than an ordinary share of beauty. Having passed her early years on the banks of the Mowhawk in comparative obscurity, she was not able to resist the allurements, which now solicited her attention. Her Father's situation at the head of a regiment was very different from that of an awkward cultivator of five hundred acres of land. Mariana without education or any knowledge of the world, found herself suddenly introduced to the best company, as they were called, certainly to persons very different from those with whom she was accustomed to associate on Sir William's estate. It is curious to remark how much sooner a woman will assimilate herself to her new company than a man—in a few weeks Mariana was transformed from a smart but bashful country lass to a leader of the fashions. She learned to dance with a most astonishing facility, and even to read and write, because they were considered by her new friends, as indispensable qualifications. The Colonel was nearly as giddy as his daughter, and delighted to indulge her in all her whims. Her whole time was taken up with dressing, dances, and country parties. She was unhappy unless preparing for a ball or a play or some select amusement. Sundays always gave her an head ache, which prevented her from attending on the Sabbath, and she neither spoke nor dreamed of any thing except merry meetings, music and dancing. A pretty Girl and the Colonel's daughter could not remain long without suitors. Mariana had numbers, but some she turned into ridicule—others she dismissed with indignation—a few she retained in order to torment them, or to profit by their folly—of these however it must be confessed, that few had ventured to address her as experienced Matrons say, to the purpose; they commonly buzzed around her, seemed eager to speak but said nothing; big with a secret, but avoided delivery. At length a genteel young man, a Captain in her Father's regiment, of irreproachable manners and of excellent parts, became attentive and disclosed the wishes of his heart. Mariana received his vows with peals of laughter; and advised him to learn to dance. She had been the Captain's partner, a few evenings before at a ball given by the paymaster, and had been much mortified and even irritated at his awkwardness in the dance. She had therefore conceived a very contemptible opinion of his abilities, and had hastily concluded that a man who could not dance was good for nothing. The Captain had too much spirit
