POETRY.

An Indian Story founded on fact.
Sombruna was daughter of Norack the brave,
For his years and his courage held high—
With hatchets and tomahawks decl'd was his cave:
His sons were all warriors; and each, as his slave,
Obey'd the least glance of his eye.
Sombruna was short, but so graceful her air,
It made the heart throb to behold her; As ebony black was the shine of her hair,
Her cheeks were tattooed, and the skin of a bear,
Hung carelessly over her shoulder.
Sombruna was happy; for Tonky, the son
Of a Cherokee chief, young and tall
Had fight'd and had knelt, till her heart he had won,
As the fat by the side of the waters that run
O'er the rocks of Niagara to fall.
Tho' her Tonky was kind, tho' her Tonky was true,
Yet at times he drank deep of the bowl
One day, overcome by its powers, he withdrew
To sleep off its fumes, in his safe-moor'd canoe,
Whilst Sombruna watch'd o'er her lov'd lo-lo.
Her charms, too alluring, a passenger saw,
As he trod the green banks of the deer:
And possess'd his love to the beautiful squaw—
She scorn'd his embraces forbidden by law,
And ran to rouse Tonky from sleep.
Sombruna ran swift, but her speed was in vain,
The stranger ran swifter before,
Loo'd the rope that made fast the canoe to the plain,
Down the stream her dear Tonky now drifted again,
Whilst Sombruna wept loud on the shore.
Now, struck with new horror, she uttered a scream,
As towards the rough cataract's verge
She beheld the canoe gliding down the full stream,
She beheld Tonky rou'd, like a man from a dream,
By the thundering roar of the surge.
Tonky seiz'd his strong paddle but seiz'd it too late!
All his strength, skill and art, were too slow;
So he wav'd a farewell to his agoniz'd mate
Cooly laid himself down and submitting to Fate,
Was plung'd in the deluge below.
