To see Christians, of all the various fects, whose differences have, in former times, kindled the flames of persecution and war, now exerting themselves in one grand object of benevolence, as brethren of the lame family, has a teadency to make men of all denominations think more of the effential principles of their common faith, and leis of their sectarian peculiarities; to foften their asperities, to subdue their prejudices, to wear away their bigotry and intolerence, and diffule evangelical candour and charity. It is the happielt scheme ever devised, fince the introduction of christianity, to liberalize and harmonize the christian world.
