From the Edinburgh Magazine.

STANZAS. (By a Lady.) Strong and chill is the death-blast, Friends are departing fast, Leaving the world to strangers and me; Where all is so bitter cold, Ah, me! the heart grows old, Long ere the dark locks whitened should be.

In many a dwelling, A dread voice is telling, That the bright eye is quenched, and the dark coffin closed; That chill, chill and rigid now Is the beauteous brow, Where thought in the sweetness of virtue reposed.

The torch was extinguished soon, That lightened you gay saloon, Where genius awoke the warbling wire; There the death-couch is spread, There the summer chaplets fade : The minstrels are dumb-Oh, break ye the lyre!

The canker-worm may consume Of beauty the early bloom, And blight the gay flower-crown of youth and of love :

But even is fatal breath Can ne'er taint the victor-wreath That is twined for the saints in the palm-bowers above.

Though tears for the dead, Warm as life-blood be shed, As we linger and watch where their cold ashes lie; Tet even there on the heart, Ah, ne'er to depart, Beams the bright Star of Hope, the Day-Spring from on high.

The lears cease to flow; The wild pulse of wor For ever is hushed in the heart and the brain-Again from these lips, As in death's dark eclipse, They forbid us to weep-" We shall yet meet again!

Children of love and light, Oh, but your robes are bright! Were ye ere the vestments of sin and of woe? Oh, yes .- Then to Him Who did you redeem, Let the high soug of praise to eternity flow. 医生产的现在分词形式的现在分词形式的现在分词形式的影响

AGRICULTURAL.

To the Conductor of the Farmer's Magazine.

THE MANAGEMENT OF LIVE STOCK ON AR-ABLE FARMS CONSIDERED. SIR,

In the important branch of rural econemy, namely, the management of live stock, great imprevement is still requisite; and however much the general system of agriculture may be amended of late years, I am of opinion we are yet so backward on this head, that there are comparatively few arable farms that would not maintain and fatten a double quantity of stock; and perhaps in some. three, four, or five times the present number, without lessening the annual produce of grain. The advantages resulting from such an increase of stock are too manifest to be overlooked, and call loudly for attention.

Upon arable farms live stock is generally considered as a secondary object, and the quantity kept is usually very small. According to the old system of husbandry, this must be the case. But by a proper combination of green crops. such as tares, clover, and buck wheat for summer; turnips, carrots, potatoes, cabbages and kale for winter; it certainly is possible for the tillage farmer to support and fatten a quantity of stock equal to the grazier, on the same number of acres; admitting the soil to be of a similar quality.

To do this, I grant, a considerable capital is absolutely necessary, as the whole expence of an arable farm is to be added to that of a grazing one. In the purchase of stock for breeding, it will be invariably found that the best are the most profitable; indeed, attention to breed cannot be too strenuously recommended in animals of every species. I would here remark, that size is no proof of excellence in any stock; and that the great object of the farmer should be to gain the greatest possible weight of animal food. from a given quantity of vegetable. If therefore, three animals of a small breed. can be fattened to a greater weight, in less time, and upon less food, than two of a larger breed, they are infinitely to be preferred.

The arable farmer should have such a supply of green food as will enable him to keep all his horses, cattle and pigs in the farm-yard throughout the year; except very young stock, which do not appear to me to answerquite so well in confinement. These, however, may be beneficial in the sheep pastures, and will require only the same fence; which, in young enclosures, is an object of no small moment. This is, beyond doubt, the most economical mode of consuming food. One acre of red clover, mown and carted to the farm-yard, will, I am confident, afford more sustenance during the summer, than three acres of the best old grass land pastured. Stall feeding I consider preferable to giving cattle food in racks in the farmyard; they are at all times quiet, and less disturbed by flies in the summer; and in winter the shelter it affords from the inclemency of the weather is of great service. Cattle never thrive so well as when they are perfectly at ease. Strict attention is also necessary to have themwell bedded with dry straw, of which much less will suffice in the house than in the yard. But the number of sheds required for this purpose may sometimes prevent the practice.

I am aware the expence of soiling will be considered a serious objection by many; but when the additional quantity of stock supported, together with the immense return of manure, and consequent amelioration of the land are taken into consideration, surely it may be viewed as a small object. One man will cut, cart the food, and attend to a very considerable number of cattle, provided the crops are good, and the land near the farm stead; and it ought always to be the work of one man, as noth ng contributes more to the thriving of animals than regular attendance. The food ought to be given frequently in small quantities, and never allowed to stand before them; and the troughs kept perfectly sweet and clean. Variety of food, too, is necessary; and it is convenient to the farmer that it is so; as it renders it easy to provide food for every season, and allows a more frequent change of crop.

To lay down a rotation of crops necessary to support this system, would occupy too large a space of your valuable publication; but to every one conversant in agriculture, it must be obvious this is by no means difficult. That the number of acres sown with corn will hereby be diminished, must be admitted : yet, from the increased excellence of the land by the green fallows, such abundant crops would be insured as to make the produce of grain fully to equal, if notexceed, all that could be raised by more frequent introduction of corn crops.

In addition to the above, let it be considered how great is the difference to the farmer between one good and two inferior crops. How immense the saving of rent, seed, and labour! Surely these circumstances will far outweigh all that can be said in opposition to soiling, on account of its attendant expence. Indeed. my own practice has so fully convinced me of the advantages of this system, that I recommend it with particular solicitude: and feel assured, that after a fair and impartial trial, no one will give it up.

ELASTICITY OF MIND. Mademoiselle du The, having lost a favorite suitor, and the event becoming public, a gentleman, who paid her a visit, found her playing on the harp. Quite surprised, he said to her, "I expected to have found you in a state of despondency," " Ah," said she in a pathetic tone, " you should have seen me yesterday."

FAULTS.

At a public dinner, Curran was defending his countrymen against the imputation of being a naturally vicious race. " Many of our faults, for instance (said he) arise from our too free use of the circulating medium (pointing to the wine) but I never yet heard of an Irishman being born drunk."

DOUBLE ENTENDRE.

A gentleman observing his gardener with an old broad brimmed hat on, jocosely asked him, who gave him that cuckold's hat. It is one of your old ones, replied the gardiner, that by mistress gave me yesterday, when you were at the races.
