The strains of the army and Sherry (Pale and navy afford some criterion of the spirit that animates them; and in like manner, the convivial lays warbled forth by the members, or would-be members of a Cabinet, are indicative of the loyalty and patriotism of the singers. I have, therefore, taken the freedom of sending you the melodious numbers of several of our statesmen; they were poured forth under the honest inspirations of champaigue and burgundy -which always make men sincere when under their influence-and you, Sir, as its " great Captain," may tell the Age what its rulers and patriots sing, when they are not aware that any "chiel's amang them," taking down their notes. The time when, or the place where, the effusions were uttered can be of no moment; the sentiments they express constitute their only importance. The first is a song by Henry Brougham, Esq.

Air, the Bells of St. Petersburg." The Rolls! the Rolls! those morning Rolls! How their rich fragrance charms our souls! When cup of China's gentle chime Tells the sweet hour of breakfast time!

Full many a life has passed away Sinco Rolls began their pleasing sway,-Advanced with butter's creamy shine, And streams of chocolate benign!

And 1-though richly 'neath this vest The milk of kindness warms my breast-Would fain send one true lover more Of Rolls to the Elysian shore.

In lauding Hampstead's heavenly fields, To none that bard of "Cockayne" yields, Who told the town such tuneful tales Of gardens and "divine green rails!"

Yet once poetic Hunt was wrong, He said our world no charm had got Like beauty in a rural spot.*

For to all hearts --- at least to mine---The Rolls' sweet spell is more divine, Than aught in this round world can be, Save that sweet cate called "Chancerie!"

The second melody, Sir, is a song by somebody, sung to

" I'd be a Butterfly." I'd be an Emperor, born in a court, Smiling on this slave, frowning on that;

Rev'lling in rare dictatorial sport, Free from insipid senatorial chat: I'd ne'er be conquered by Liberty's charms,

About whose sweet person each mad poet sings; But blest in Bellona's congenial arms,

I'd be a prince, or the best of all Kings!

Protector of England, unfetter'd I'd be, Defender of Scotia, and Cambria's lord: Prince of Hibernia, that "gem of the sea," Keeping sweet peace with my magical

I'd never sigh for the tedious games Of forms and of fancies that parliaments

I'd give warm patriots a bath in the Thames, Melting their love for "sweet Freedom" by some Joseph Surface, gave the following ditty, which he composed on a misfortune that happened to him some time since at Oxford. Air, " The last rose of Summer."

'Tis the last vote I can bring Left blooming alone; All his kindred that can sing Have voted and gone:

No friends come with flags gay, And trumpet's glad note, To inspire his faint huzza And give vote for vote!

I'll not leave thee, dear Plumper, To pine at the poll, Go and get thee a bumper To cheer up thy soul;

Streams of brandy, soft rippling, Can sorrow's tide stem,---Where the thirsty are tippling,

Go tipple with them. Fift soon will I follow, Since interests decay, And no more my view holloa

The base pack obey; Since true hearts have voted, And false ones have flown, O who would inhabit

These hustings alone? After this effusion, Sir, the vocalists adjourned at a very late, or rather an early hours singing in chorus, ---

" See the rosy morn appearing," &c.
