was then quartered; on the following of the Times.) morning, about eight o'clock, I was walking in the Castle-yard, awaiting a summons when the subject of my anecdote occurred. Every body has seen or heard of the Castle the time I write of, there was one to be seen pacing the half dozen flags allotted to him, and inhaling the savoury steam of fat things issuing upwards through the gratings of the kitchen areas of vice-regal courtiers. By the by, the duties assigned to many of said sentries were sufficiently ludicrous, and have often overcome the gravity which Lought to have maintained when questioning them as to their orders. One was posted in a gloomy passage, to prevent ingury to an old iron lamp, glass-less, and open to the four winds of heaven; another, a sort of moveable "commit no nuisance," protected a certain corner, overlooked from the apartments of the house-maids; but the most ridiculous was the reply made to me, by a solitary centry in a little inclosed grass plat; "What are your orders, Sir? "To do my duty to all officers, and to watch the air." Not perceiving that the man was a cockney, I concluded that he was placed there for some meteorological purpose; however, the amused corporal explained to me, that the man's sole business was to look to the safety of a pet hare; -but this is a digression. The court of the castle forms extremity are arched ways, on which are sentrics, as also is one on the King's colour which accompanies the guard, and is fixed in a stone rest in the centre of the court. Whilst walking, as I have already said, my attention was suddenly attracted by a-noise and shouting in the lower yard, through the archway leading from which, in a few moments, dashed up a furious and Office of the Cataraqui Bridge Company, ferocious-looking bull, bellowing with rage, and his nostrils almost touching the ground he spurned; fortunately the sentry at this passage, on hearing the noise, stopped short clear of the archway, as the monster, glancing his eye at him, rushed on at the man at the colours, who sprang to the portico of the state apartments, and esconced himself behind a pillar. The bull, irritated at missing his object, ran straight on, with redoubled fury, at my hero, posted at the archway of the opposite extremity of the oblong, who appeared to be devoted to destruction, as, with arms supported, he calmly awaited the onset. He was an Irishman, a grenadicr, and an old and good soldier, who always obeyed orders to the bargains in the manufacturing towns, letter. On rushed the monster headlong at him, with a roar which I long remembered, and just as Pat's life had not been worth a second's purchase, he carried arms, ported, and came to the charge, half sinking on his knoes, whilst he made a lounge at his formidable assailant at the moment their purchases. They may depend on of collision. It was a fearful thing, and I closed my eyes, horrified at the only result which I could anticipate; however, a shout of triumph from the rabble rout of the pursuing mob quickly convinced me that my apprehensions were needless. I beheld the brute, but an instant before so fierce, stretched lifeless upon the earth, the black froth pouring from his mouth; whilst the attention of poor Pat, nothing the worse for his encounter, was solely bestowed on his broken bayonet, which he eyed very the season as follows, viz: ruefully, and on my asking if he would wish to be relieved, in consequence of the shock lie must have received, he declined, merely begging that I would bear witness that his arms were injured in defending his post. In a few minutes the owner of the bull arrived, with ropes and horses to drag it away .-From him I learnt that the animal had ala nuisance in its neighbourhood, it had intermediate places. been disposed of to the butcher, who that morning had treated his friends to a bullbait, previous to knocking the brute on the head; the humane amusement having been concluded, the bull escaped from its tormentors, when being driven to the slaugh- Montreal stage-touching at Brockville | Richmond-on the 17th and 18 June, ter-house in the rear of the castle.
