" Of such a man his country may be proud." This is an old-fashioned eulogy; or recoverable abroad, that this Agency Notes offered for discount, and made not perhaps the worse for that; and yet it has established, under the special anspices payable at not more than ninety days suits Hogg as exactly as if it had been in- and patronage of distinguished individuals after date, must be put under cover to vented expressly on his account. Of such in this country, a regular correspondence the Cashier, and left at this office the a man his country may be proud. We with eminent Bankers, &c., in the princirespect and admire him. We respect the pal ports and capitals of Foreign Governenergy that has made its own way-the industry that has done the best with materials within its power. We admire the genius which has added to our literature so much of its better part-simple, touching, and beautiful poetry. Hogg has just translated the fine old airs of his country into words. A strong feeling has gone straight from his heart to his song, and nothing can be more real than his sorrow, unless it be his mirth. He is the poet of actual emotions. To use a simile-fit fashion of reviewing poetry-he is like one of his own mountain rivulets gushing forth in music and sunshine, melody and merriment-tender, yet joyous. Moreover, there is a quaint sturdiness about him, which is something between the independent man and spoilt child. The running commentary on his own songs is one of the most amusing and original things we rea few of these prefaces.
