POETRY.

THE POET'S DEATH-BED.

YE tell me 'tis the evening; -then, ere the day be flown, The casement ope, that I may see the last of suns go down. With beams as beautiful he'il rise to gladden earth again, And wake the world with life and light,-but ed manner. shine for me in vain.

Yes-the azure sky above, and the green earth I yet would take a last fareweil to cheer me ere And I will deem the light that glows along the verge of even, And plays upon the faded cheek, the smile of opening heaven.

fragrant breath, That wafts a message from the bowers to soothe the bed of death; That bears a whisper from the woods, a farewell from the spring-A tale of opening leaf and bud---while I am

And let me hear the small birds sing among the garden bowers Their evening hymn, that wont to bliss my solitary hours: That choral anthem, warbled wild upon the leafy Will glad this ear, that to the strain must soon be deaf for aye.

And blame me not, that, called away upon a land of bliss, I fondly linger on the shores of such a world as

And better love than aught I know of bright immortal spheres, This earth, so lovely in her woe, so beautiful in

Ye say that songs of triumph swell, and flowers

Along the streams of life that flow'mid scenes beyond the grave; But shall I love the fadeless blooms and songs of endless joy, flowers that bloom to die! And now I give the parting kiss, and wave the parting hand,

Like strains that make it bliss to weep, and

My passing spirit's on the wing to seek the distant land, -Yet loved ones of my heart, with whom I may no longer dwell,

And thou green earth, with all thy streams, woods, songs, and flowers,-farewell!

Bishop Heber's Sentiments on Amusements. -It will be seen, as well from the tenour of Mr. Reginald Heber's writing already before the world as from the present correspondence, and although his mind was deeply imbued with devotional feelings, he considered a moderate participation in what are generally called "WORALDLY AMUSEMENTS," as allowable and blameless. When the Editor requested his advice on the subject, the year after her marriage, being for a short time without him in London, his answer was, "you may go where you please, as I am sure you will not exceed the limits of moderation, except to Sunday evening par- | For each cabin passenger (including fare) 2 0 ties, to which I have a very serious objection." He thought that the strictness, which made no distinction between things blameable only in their abuse, and the practices which were really immoral, was PREJU-DICIAL to the interests of TRUE RELIGION : and on this opinion remained unchanged to the last. His own life, indeed, was a proof that amusements so participated in, may be PERFECTLY HARMLESS, and no way interfere with any religious or moral duty. The Sabbath he keptwith Christian reverence but not with Mosiacal strictness.

Montesquieu distinguishes two kinds of persons who are met with in society; those who afford amusement, in opposition to those who think .- Alas! why did Montesquieu omit a third and much more numerous class, consisting of those who neither think nor afford amusement?
