It was an hour and a place hands on or before the 7th January next, fitted for deep meditation-for self-examination; and (dare I confess it, even to you?) for communion with the invisible spirits that draw pearer to our world, when the bustle and business of life yield to that repose which the soul delights in. I lingered where I had first strayed, until the beams of the early moon silvered the clustering ivy that climbs the church yard wall; this partial light, while it deepened the darkness of the avenue, warned me that the night was ken the house lately occupied by Mr, come. " Strange I should meet you here, Leyden: but there is a fate in all things, and a cruel one has been mine! There are those, I know, who disbelieve this; but you shall bear. I need not ask if you remember her, or the anxiety with which I strove to win affections that, at the very time, were comparatively worthless in my eyes. You seem astonished; but so it was. I was nothaif as eager to possess her as I was to rival you.

You had boasted of your security; you had openly defied me; you had baffled me; in more ways than one; you had preserved your temper your equanimity, in all our differences. In all essential things, you were more than my superior; but the peculiar tact that can call forth all the fascinating littleness of every day existence, and mould them to the best advantage, was fatally awarded to me. To mortify you, and show forth my own power as best I might. I resolved to try my success with the innocont Cicely. At first, I trifled in mere, but wicked wantoness, as I had done with others; but gradually I felt her acquiring a powerful ascendency. Her innocence, her purity, her full and perfect simplicity, and the celestial character of her beauty, which gained, instead of loosing by more intimate acquaintance, overpowered me. I might well be compared to a second Satan, tempting a second Eve, who dwelt in the paradisc of pure and holy imaginings. I had little faith in woman, whom I had long regarded only as the object of sensual pleasure a compound of the affections, but destitute of the mental powers that elevate our higher natures. For a longth of time, the untaught girl of eighteen baffled the practised libertine of five-and-twenty. But in the and, a secret marriage as I called it, gratified my passion, and gave nothing more to woo for. The rifled flower withered at my touch. Cicely was too holy, too refined, to enchain a wandering profligate. Her silent, but visible virtues, rose up in judgment against me. Her voice-Leyden, you remember her voice-its very tones gave me positive pain; her small white hand, when resting on my bosom, felt heavy and cold as lead; and all those little offices of kindness, which woman only can bestow, became absolutely disgusting to me-When, with blushes and many tears, she told me that she must, in time become a mother, and begged me, for my infant's sake, to confess our marriage, I thrust her During the remainder of that day, Lon- from me.
