From the New Monthly Magazine. AN EPISODE OF REAL LIFE. Concluded.

As I rowed towards the creek, the spire of Milton church stood coldly, and I thought reproachfully out against the sky; there was nothing else which indicated the proximity of human habitation; for the little town of Gravesend. then only a straggling village, was concealed by a sudden winding of the river. Amid this solitude the fiend was busy with me, and whispered devilish suggestions in my ear. Cicely seemed resolved to retain my name. I felt that she would be an everlasting barrier to my advancement, as I called it; and the affair, if bruited abroad, was almost too serious to receive the applause even of my gayest friends. I believe I was coward enough to dread the resentment of her gray-headed father. I tremble at my own imaginings, and passed my hand across my burning brow, as it to dissipate ideas, which, congregating there, became too strong for my enfeebled brain. My boat touched the strand, and Cicely sprang upon my bosom. Cod how I hated her, even when her arms were clasped, with all the intensity of THE subscriber having been apwoman's love, around my neck! when, upon her innocent head, she covered my hands with kisses, and, crouching sery-to the scorn of the scorner-to the bitterness of self reproach. Her long dark hair clustered over her figure, and her soft eyes were turned upon meas the dove turns, in its agony, its last gaze upon the vulture that destroys its most sweet life-yet, in that hour, Leyden, I hated with a deadly hatred-"

The low choking of his voice, and the impeded utterance with which he pronounced the last words, made my blood run cold. He paused ; but I could nei- | Messrs. A. & W. Morris, & Co. "I am sure she read my purpose; for she implored that, for the sake of the unborn, I would spare her life. I thing her from me with violence ;-she shuddered, and, exhausted by exertion, fainted at my feet. I gazed upon her pale i and beautiful features, which grief had touched, but not destroyed. 'Why, whispered the ready demon that dwells within the bosom of the wicked, and impels him to destruction- why should she awaken to the shame and disgrace that must await her? Why should she; awaken to mar your fortunes? What is death but everlasting sleep?' Leyden, I raised her in my arms, and, turning away my head, consigned her to the everlasting waters! O God! O God! that this had been all-that she had departed without the knowledge which. for a brief moment, she acquired. The sudden plunge revived her paralyzed senses, and, with a wild and fearful shriek, she sprang upwards. She would have grasped the boat, but I-I-"

Suddenly I remembered that your friend was but anticipating the hangman's office; and, letting loose my hands, and throwing myself upon the long grass, which contained her mouldering tomb, I found relief in a violent burst of tears. One weight, one dreadful weight was removed from my mind. SHE had not the horrid guilt of self destruction on her soul; for that I fervently blessed the Almighty. And, when I turned and beheld the creature, 'who was clothed in purple and fine linen, and fared sumptuously every day," crawling amid the receptacles of the tranquil dead, unable to arise like a man, and stand erect before his maker, but trembling with fear and sin, even in that hallowed solitude.
