ANOTHER smiling New Year's Day Invites the rude, the artless lay, Of your assiduous News-Boy, who, With constant care, and labour too, Endcavours, in his Patron's grace, To merit a distinguished place. And now with poetic address Again would greet them, and express His wishes for their happiness. May they throughout the year to come Enjoy content; and may their home Be crown'd with plenty; and their land Yield two-fold increase in their hand. May no discordant factions jar; May no relentless sanguine war Invade our shores .-- And here we pause A tear to shed o'er Freedom's cause. Thine Poland! thy much injured name Yet unextinguished lives to fame, And to the base usurper's shame; But low has set thy freedom's sun-Thy heroes have their races run; And thou, unhappy Poland, now Unto the yoke must tamely bow. And was there none could shield thee from Such direful, overwhelming doom? No aid to thee from England sent, When danger was so imminent; Where tarried France: why was she slow To strike for thee the' avenging blow, And free thee from the invading foe? Alas! none interposed; nay, all Awaited calmly till thy fall Had irremediably sealed The fate of that contested field. Thus, Poland, sunk thy warriors brave, And not a hand outstretched to save!

But, hold; this subject we will waive; A Printer's Imp should not be grave When greeting, on the opening year, His Patrons, with his annual cheer. Although his painful task it be (And who from grief is wholly free?) To' record unpleasant scenes as well As those which are agreeable. Reflections grave he'll gladly yield To abler pens than he can wield; And only pray his Patrons ne'er, In this our western hemisphere, Such dire events may have to fear; Such scenes of misery and of woe, May they, oh may they, never know. My gentle sirs, I pray excuse The wanderings of a youthful muse; And be not chagrined if again She, ere she close her simple strain, Conduct your willing thoughts once more Unto the trans-atlantic shore. And first, we'll give a hasty glance

At the disastrous state of France, "Where civil dudgeon oft grows high, " And men fall out they know not why, " And fiercely fight, like mad or drunk, " For Dame Religion, as for punk." (Forgive our rudeness we beseech, And take not umbrage at our speech ; Although the sentiment be coarse, It is not therefore of less force.) How applicable the quotation, Witness the conflicts in that nation; Those horrid outrages upon The clerical profes--sion; Those bloody massacres which hurl'd From this probationary world, Sans benefit of Clergy, --- those Poor Clergy-men, whose crime arose, From what? from neither more nor less Than that they--wisely, I confess---Being servants of his Holiness, Had thought they unrestrained might do Just what their will inclined them to, And much indignant were to find, "Misguided mortals" mis-inclined, To question the divinity Of him who filled the papal sec. And more than that; oh! void of shame, Dared to dispute his awful claim To' the full and absolute controul Of both the body and the soul! But peace be with them ; if peace may; We who are left in peace will pray; And though it threaten, yet we hope, Such fate may never reach -- the Pope.

And England now, with much concern, Our anxious eyes to thee we turn; And, see! the "Spirit of Reform," Like mists before the gath'ring storm, Portentous, rising on the view, Assuming still a darker hue, And measuring with unbounded stride, Proud Britain's Isle from side to side.

Thus much for Europe---now we come To "peep at" the affairs of home. And here your rhyming bard might long Protract the limits of his song, To tell what things are agitated,---What things are canvassed or debated ;--What things of interest; of what nature---Now occupy the Legislature. But lest we should too prolix grow, These matters all we will forego, Your patience that you may not lose, We now bid farewell to the muse; Whose utmost wish is answered, If she have but contributed To please you --- and her best reward---Some token of your kind regard.

THE CHRONICLE BOY.

Last moments of Mr. Salt the late British Consul General in Egypt .-The impression never ceased to haunt him that his chamber was a charnel, and that he owed his deliverance from it to a mighty effort of his moral courage. He entertained the extraordinary notion that he had been for several days attending his own funeral, or rather in purhe had the key of it brought to him, and nage.

his escape. He lingered through the day, and about nightfall we had a repetition of the horrors of the preceding evening. We had been all completely exhausted with continued watching for nearly thirty days, and itwas not to be wondered at that the attendant who was left in charge was sometimes found nodding at his duty. A very few hours before the close of the last scene, his Greek servant Yani, who was seated half asleep by the bed side, was suddenly startled by the noise of some one filling on the floor. On approaching the spot, he found his master extended at full length. He had stolen from his bed, as on the preceeding night, but his strength soon failed him, and he sunk by the bed side a convulsion followed, which had distorted his features; and such was his appearance when the Creek beheld him, that in the stupefaction of the moment, he stooped down and pressed his thumbs to his eyelids, believing him to be either dead or in the agony of dying. At that moment Mr. Montefiore approached, and thrust aside the stupid servant. with whom the poor invalid was feebly struggling; and no soaner was he released, ply, the subscriber intends to detail the than he stretched forth his cold hand, and, grasping that of Mr. Montefiore, he exclaimed in a piteous tone-" Oh, doctor, this is Frankenstein!" These were the last words he ever spoke .-Metropolitan.

Major Cadell of the 28th Regiment. -It will be recollected that this gentle man, an officer highly esteemed in his corps, was tried in August for having appeared in a state of intoxication. The following is the result of the trial :-The Court Martial, after considering the evidence in support and refutation of the charge, is of opinion that Major Cadell, 28th Regiment, is guilty of the charge preferred against him. The Court, therefore, in consideration of the long and meritorious services of Major Cadell, as also the high character given of bim as an officer and gentleman-as well as from the strong impression on the minds of the Court that the prisoner had drank very little on that day and that the intoxication was the effect of illness, added to fatigue and over exertion, beg humbly and earnestly to recommend him to His Majesty's most gracious clemency. IMPROVEMENT IN PAPER.—Our Liverpool Correspondent states that a very important improvement in the manufacture of paper has very recently been introduced at the works of the Messrs. Harris, Brothers, &c. of that place. It is effected by a machine for straining the pulp, which entirely frees it from knots before it goes upon the mould and thus it acquires a perfectly even and unblemished surface, which makes it far more commodious range of stables --- and where pleasant to write, rule, print, or in fact, to work upon in any way, and gives besides to the work a much handsomer appearance than what is done on paper made in the ordinary method .- Quebec Mercury.
